YOGA-VĀSISHTHA-MAHĀRĀMĀYANA.

VOL. I

PROSPECTUS.

Plato advised the Athenians to betake themselves to the study of Mathematics, in order to evade the pestilence incident to the international war which was raging in Greece; so it is the intention of this publication, to exhort our countrymen to the investigation of Metaphysics, in order to escape the contagion of Politics and _quasi_ politics, which has been spreading far and wide over this devoted land.

PREFACE.

In this age of the cultivation of universal learning and its investigation into the deep recesses of the dead languages of antiquity, when the literati of both continents are so sedulously employed in exploring the rich and almost inexhaustible mines of the ancient literature of this country, it has given an impetus to the philanthropy of our wise and benign Government to the institution of a searching enquiry into the sacred language of this land. And when the restoration of the long lost works of its venerable sages and authors through the instrumentality of the greatest bibliomaniac savants and linguists in the several Presidencies, [1] has led the literary Asiatic Societies of the East and West to the publication of the rarest and most valuable Sanskrit Manuscripts, it cannot be deemed preposterous in me to presume, to lay before the Public a work of no less merit and sanctity than any hitherto published.

The Yoga Vasishtha is the earliest work on Yoga or Speculative and Abstruse philosophy delivered by the venerable Vedic sage Vasishtha to his royal pupil Ráma; the victor of Rávana, and hero of the first Epic Rámáyana, and written in the language of Válmiki, the prime bard in pure Sanskrit, the author of that popular Epic, and Homer of India. It embodies in itself the Loci Communes or common places relating to the science of Ontology, the knowledge of Sat—Real Entity, and Asat—Unreal Non-entity; the principles of Psychology or doctrines of the Passions and Feelings; the speculations of Metaphysics in dwelling upon our cognition, volition and other faculties of the Mind (ज्ञान, ज्ञेय, ज्ञाता, इच्छा, द्वेषादि) and the tenets, of Ethics and practical morality (धर्म कर्म). Besides there are a great many precepts on Theology, and the nature of the Divinity (आत्मानात्म विवेक), and discourses on Spirituality and Theosophy (जीवात्मा परमात्मा ज्ञान); all delivered in the form of Plato's Dialogues between the sages, and tending to the main enquiry concerning the true felicity, final beatitude or Summum bonum (परम निःश्रेयस) of all true philosophy.

These topics have singly and jointly contributed to the structure of several separate Systems of Science and Philosophy in succeeding ages, and have formed the subjects of study both with the juvenile and senile classes of people in former and present times, and I may say, almost among all nations in all countries throughout the civilized world.

It is felt at present to be a matter of the highest importance by the native community at large, to repress the growing ardour of our youth in political polemics and practical tactics, that are equally pernicious to and destructive of the felicity of their temporal and future lives, by a revival of the humble instructions of their peaceful preceptors of old, and reclaiming them to the simple mode of life led by their forefathers, from the perverted course now gaining ground among them under the influence of Western refinement. Outward peace (शान्ति) with internal tranquility (चित्त प्रशान्ति) is the teaching of our Sastras, and these united with contentment (सन्तोष) and indifference to worldly pleasures (वैराग्य), were believed according to the tenets of Yoga doctrines, to form the perfect man,—a character which the Aryans have invariably preserved amidst the revolutions of ages and empires. It is the degeneracy of the rising generation, however, owing to their adoption of foreign habits and manners from an utter ignorance of their own moral code, which the publication of the present work is intended to obviate.

From the description of the Hindu mind given by Max Müller; in his History of the Ancient Literature of India (p. 18) it will appear, that the esoteric faith of the Aryan Indian is of that realistic cast as the Platonic, whose theory of ontology viewed all existence, even that of the celestial bodies, with their movements among the precepta of sense, and marked them among the unreal phantoms (मिथ्यादृष्टि) or vain mirage, (मरीचिका) as the Hindu calls them, that are interesting in appearance but useless to observe. They may be the best of all precepta, but fall very short of that perfection, which the mental eye contemplates in its meditation-yoga. The Hindu Yogi views the visible world exactly in the same light as Plato has represented it in the simile commencing the seventh book of his Republic. He compares mankind to prisoners in a cave, chained in one particular attitude, so as to behold only an ever varying multiplicity of shadows, projected through the opening of the cave upon the wall before them, by certain unseen realities behind. The philosopher alone, who by training or inspiration is enabled to turn his face from these visions, and contemplate with his mind, that can see at-once the unchangeable reality amidst these transient shadows.

The first record that we have of Vasishtha is, that he was the author of the 7th Mandala of the Rig Veda (Ashtaka v. 15-118). He is next mentioned as Purohita or joint minister with Viswámitra to king Sudása, and to have a violent contest with his rival for the (पौरोहित्य) or ministerial office (Müll. Hist. S. Lit. page 486, Web. Id. p. 38). He is said to have accompanied the army of Sudása, when that king is said to have conquered the ten invading chiefs who had crossed over the river Parushni—(Hydroates or Ravi) to his dominions (Müll. Id. p. 486). Viswámitra accompanied Sudása himself beyond Vipása,—Hyphasis or Beah and Satadru—Hisaudras—Sutlej (Max Müller, Ancient Sanscrit literature page 486). These events are recorded to have occurred prior to Vasishtha's composition of the Mandala which passes under his name and in which they are recorded. (Müll. Id. p. 486).

The enmity and implacable hatred of the two families of Vasishthas and Viswámित्रas for generations, form subjects prominent throughout the Vedic antiquity, and preserved in the tradition of ages (Müll. Id. p. 486, Web. Id. p. 37). Another cause of it was that, Harischandra, King of Ayodhyá, was cursed by Vasishtha, whereupon he made Viswámitra his priest to the annoyance of Vasishtha, although the office of Bráhmāna was held by him (Müller Id. page 408 Web. pp. 31-37). In the Bráhmāna period we find Vasishtha forming a family title for the whole Vasishtha race still continuing as a Gotra name, and that these Vasishthas continued as hereditary Gurus and purohitas to the kings of the solar race from generation to generation under the same title. The Vasishthas were always the Brahmanas or High priests in every ceremony, which could not be held by other Bráhmānas according to the Sāta patha Bráhmāna (Müll. Id. page 92); and particularly the Indra ceremony had always to be performed by a Vasishtha, because it was revealed to their ancestor the sage Vasishtha only (Web. Ind. Lit. p. 123); and as the Sátapatha Bráhmāna-Taittiriya Sanhitá mentions it.

सोऽब्रवीत् ब्रह्माणं ते वक्ष्यामि । यथात्वत् पुरोहिताः प्रजाः प्रजनिष्यन्ते ।

"The Rishis do not see Indra clearly, but Vasishtha saw him. Indra said, I will tell you, O Bráhmān, so that all men who are born, will have a Vasishtha for his Purohita" (Max Müll. Anc. Sans. Lit. p. 92. Web. Id. p. 123). This will show that the Sloka works, which are attributed to Vasishtha, Yájñavalkya or any other Vedic Rishi, could not be the composition of the old Rishis, but of some one of their posterity; though they might have been propounded by the eldest sages, and then put to writing by oral communication or successive tradition by a distant descendant or disciple of the primitive Rishis. Thus we see the Dráhyáyana Sūtras of the Sama Veda is also called the Vasishtha Sūtras, from the author's family name of Vasishtha (Web. Id. p. 79). The āśvaláyana Grihya Sūtra assigns some other works to Vasishtha, viz., the Vasishtha pragáthá, probably Vashishtha Hymni of Bopp; the Pavamānya, Kshudra sukta, Mahásukta &c. written in the vedic style. There are two other works attributed to Vasishtha, the Vasishtha Sanhitá on Astronomy (Web. Id. p. 258) and the Vasishtha Smriti on Law (Web. Id. p. 320), which from their compositions in Sanscrit slokas, could not be the language or work of the Vedic Rishi, but of some one late member of that family. Thus our work of Yoga Vasishtha has no claim or pretension to its being the composition of the Vedic sage; but as one propounded by the sage, and written by Válmiki in his modern Sanskrit. Here the question is whether Vasishtha the preceptor of Ráma, was the Vedic Vasishtha or one of his descendants, I must leave for others to determine.

Again in the later Áranyaka period we have an account of a theologian Vasishtha given in the Árshikopanishad, as holding a dialogue on the nature of átmá or soul between the sages, Viswámitra, Jamadagni, Bharadwája, Gautama and himself; when Vasishtha appealing to the opinion of Kapila obtained their assent (Weber Id. p. 162). This appears very probably to be the theological author of our yoga, and eminent above his contemporaries in his knowledge of the Kapila yoga sástra which was then current, from this sage's having been a contemporary with king Sagara, a predecessor of Rama.

In the latest Sútra period we find a passage in the Grihya-Sútra-parisishta, about the distinctive mark of the Vasishtha Family from those of the other parishads or classes of the priesthood. It says;

दक्षिणकपर्दोवशिष्ठाः आत्रेयास्तिकपद्मिनः ।
आङ्गिरसः पञ्चचूडाः मुण्डाभृगवः शिखिनोऽन्ये ॥

"The Vasishthas wear a braid (lock of hair) on the right side, the Átreyas wear three braids, the Angiras have five braids, the Bhrigus are bald, and all others have a single crest," (Müller Id. p. 53). The Karma pradipa says, "the Vasishthas exclude meat from their sacrifice; वशिष्ठोक्तविधिः कृत्स्नो द्रष्टव्यान् निरामिषः ।" (Müller A. S. Lit. p. 54), and the colour of their dress was white (Id. p. 483). Many Vasishthas are named in different works as; वशिष्ठ चेकितायनः, वशिष्ठ आरिहणीयः, वशिष्ठ मैत्रावरणिः, वशिष्ठः राणायणः, वशिष्ठ लाठ्यायनः, वशिष्ठ द्राह्यायनः, वशिष्ठकौण्डिन्यः, वशिष्ठइन्द्रप्रमदः, वशिष्ठः आभरद्वसुः, and some others, bearing no other connection with our author, than that of their having been members of the same family (Müller's A. S. Lit. p. 44).

Without dilating any longer with further accounts relating to the sage Vasishtha of which many more might be gathered from various sastras, I shall add in the conclusion the following notice which is taken of this work by Professor Monier Williams in his work on Indian Wisdom p. 370.

"There is," says he, "a remarkable work called Vasishtha Rámáyana or Yoga Váshishtha or Vasishtha Maháramáyana in the form of an exhortation, with illustrative narratives addressed by Vasishtha to his pupil the youthful Ráma, on the best means of attaining true happiness, and considered to have been composed as an appendage to the Rámáyana by Válmiki himself. There is another work of the same nature called the Adhyátma Rámáyana which is attributed to Vyása, and treat of the moral and theological subjects connected with the life and acts of that great hero of Indian history. Many other works are extant in the vernacular dialects having the same theme for their subject which it is needless to notice in this place."

Vasishtha, known as the wisest of sages, like Solomon the wisest of men, and Aurelius the wisest of emperors, puts forth in the first part and in the mouth of Ráma the great question of the vanity of the world, which is shown synthetically to a great length from the state of all living existences, the instinct, inclinations, and passions of men, the nature of their aims and objects, with some discussions about destiny, necessity, activity and the state of the soul and spirit. The second part embraces various directions for the union of the individual with the universal Abstract Existence—the Supreme Spirit—the subjective and the objective truth—and the common topics of all speculative philosophy.

187239 Thus says Milton; "The end of learning is to know God."

187241 So the Persian adage, "Akhiral ilm buad ilmi Khodá."

187242
187243 Such also the Sanskrit, "Sávidyá tan matir yayá."

187244
187245 And the sruti says, "Yad jnátwá náparan jnánam."

187246
187247 _i. e._ "It is that which being known, there is nothing else required to 187248 be known."

187856	THE YOGA PHILOSOPHY.
187859	The Yoga or contemplative philosophy of the Hindus, is rich, exuberant,

grand and sublime, in as much as it comprehends within its ample sphere and deep recesses of meditation, all that is of the greatest value, best interest and highest importance to mankind, as physical, moral, intellectual and spiritual beings—a knowledge of the cosmos—of the physical and intellectual worlds.

It is rich in the almost exhaustless treasure of works existing on the subject in the sacred and vernacular languages of the country both of ancient and modern times. It is exuberant in the profusion of erudition and prolixity of ingenuity displayed in the Yoga philosophy of Patanjali, commensurate with the extraordinary calibre of the author in his commentary of the Mahābhāshya on Pānini (Müller's A. S. Lit. p. 235). Its grandeur is exhibited in the abstract and abstruse reflections and investigations of philosophers in the intellectual and spiritual worlds as far as human penetration has been able to reach. And its sublimity is manifested in its aspiring disquisition into the nature of the human and divine souls, which it aims to unite with the one self-same and all pervading spirit.

It has employed the minds of gods, sages, and saints, and even those of heroes and monarchs, to the exaltation of their natures above the rest of mankind, and elevation of their dignities to the rank of gods, as nothing less than a godly nature can approach and approximate that of the All-perfect Divinity. So says Plato in his Phaedras; "To contemplate these things is the privilege of the gods, and to do so is also the aspiration of the immortal soul of man generally; though only in a few cases is such aspiration realized."

The principal gods Brahmā and Siva are represented as Yogis, the chief sages Vyāsa, Vālmiki, Vasishtha and Yājñavalkya were propounders of Yoga systems; the saints one and all were adepts in Yoga; the heroes Rāma and Krishna were initiated in it, and the kings Dasaratha and Janaka and their fellow prince Buddha were both practitioners and preceptors of Yoga. Mohammed held his nightly communions with God and his angels, and Jesus often went over the hills—there to pray and contemplate. Socrates had his demon to communicate with, and in fact every man has his genius with whom he communes on all matters. All this is Yoga, and so is all knowledge derived by intuition, inspiration and revelation, said to be the result of Yoga.

II. SCIENCES CONNECTED WITH YOGA

The yoga philosophy, while it treats of a variety of subjects, is necessarily a congeries of many sciences in itself. It is the Hindu form of metaphysical argument for the existence of the 'One Eternal'—the Platonic "Reality." It is ontology in as much as it teaches a priori the being of God. It is psychology in its treatment of the doctrine of feelings and passions, and it is morality in teaching us to keep them under control as brutal propensities, for the sake of securing our final emancipation and ultimate restoration into the spirit of spirits. Thus it partakes of the nature of many sciences in treating of the particular subject of divinity.

The Yoga in its widest sense of the application of the mind to any subject is both practical, called kriyā Yoga, as also theoretical, known as Jñāna Yoga; and includes in itself the two processes of synthesis and analysis alike, in its combination (Yoga) of things together, and discrimination (Viveka) of one from the other, in its inquiry into the nature of things (Vastuvichāra), and investigation of their abstract essence called Satyānusandhānā. It uses both the a priori (pūrvavat) and a posteriori (paravat) arguments to prove the existence of the world from its Maker and the vice versa, as indicated in the two aphorisms of induction and deduction Yatová imani and Janmadyasya yatah &c. It views both subjectively and objectively the one self in many and the many in one unto which all is to return, by the two mysterious formulas of So ham and tat twam &c.

It is the reunion of detached souls with the Supreme that is the chief object of the Yoga philosophy to effect by the aforesaid processes and other means, which we propose fully to elucidate in the following pages; and there is no soul we think so very reprobate, that will feel disinclined to take a deep interest in them, in order to effect its reunion with the main source of its being and the only fountain of all blessings. On the contrary we are led to believe from the revival of the yoga-cult with the spiritualists and theosophists of the present day under the teachings of Madame Blavatsky and the lectures of Col. Olcott, that the Indian public are beginning to appreciate the efficacy of Yoga meditation, and its practice gaining ground among the pious and educated men in this country.

Notwithstanding the various significations of Yoga and the different lights in which it is viewed by several schools, as we shall see afterwards, it is most commonly understood in the sense of the esoteric faith of the Hindus, and the occult adoration of God by spiritual meditation. This is considered on all hands as the only means of one's ultimate liberation from the general doom of birth and death and the miseries of this world, and the surest way towards the final absorption of one's-self in the Supreme,—the highest state of perfection and the Summum bonum of the Hindu. The subject of Yoga Vasishtha is no other than the effecting of that union of the human with the Divine Soul, amidst all the trials and tribulations of life.

III. THE YOGA OF ENGLISH WRITERS.

The yoga considered merely as a mode or system of meditation is variously described by European authors, as we shall see below.

Monier Williams says "According to Patanjali—the founder of the system, the word yoga is interpreted to mean the act of "fixing or concentration of the mind in abstract meditation". Its aim is to teach the means by which the human soul may attain complete union with the Supreme Soul, and of effecting the complete fusion of the individual with the universal spirit even in the body", Indian Wisdom p. 102.

Weber speaking of the yoga of the Atharvan Upanishads says; "It is the absorption in ātman, the stages of this absorption and the external means of attaining it." Again says he; "The yoga in the sense of union with the Supreme Being, is absorption therein by means of meditation. It occurs first in the latter Upanishads, especially the tenth book of the Taittiriya and the Katha Upanishads, where the very doctrine is itself enunciated", Hist. Ind Lit p. 153-171.

Müllins in his prize essay on Vedanta says, the Sankhya yoga is the union of the body and mind, p. 183. In its Vedantic view, it is the joining of the individual with the Supreme Spirit by holy communion of the one with the other through intermediate grades, whereby the limited soul may be led to approach its unlimited fountain and lose itself in the same.

IV. YOGA-CHARACTERISTIC OF THE HINDUS.

Max Müller characterises the Hindu as naturally disposed to Yoga or a contemplative turn of his mind for his final beatitude in the next life, amidst all his cares, concerns and callings in this world, which he looks upon with indifference as the transient shadows of passing clouds, that serve but to dim for a moment but never shut out from his view the full blaze of his luminous futurity. This description is so exactly graphic of the Hindu mind, that we can not withhold giving it entire as a mirror of the Hindu mind to our readers on account of the scarcity of the work in this country.

"The Hindu" says he "enters the world as a stranger; all his thoughts are directed to another world, he takes no part even where he is driven to act, and even when he sacrifices his life, it is but to be delivered from it." Again "They shut their eyes to this world of outward seeming activity, to open them full on the world of thought and rest. Their life was a yearning for eternity; their activity was a struggle to return to that divine essence from which this life seemed to have severed them. Believing as they did in a really existing and eternal Being _to ontos-onton_ they could not believe in the existence of this passing world."

"If the one existed, the other could only seem to exist; if they lived in the one they could not live in the other. Their existence on earth was to them a problem, their eternal life a certainty. The highest object of their religion was to restore that bond by which their own self (_átman_) was linked to the eternal self (_paramátman_); to recover that unity which had been clouded and obscured by the magical illusions of reality, by the so-called _Máyá_ of creation."

"It scarcely entered their mind to doubt or to affirm the immortality of the soul (_pretia-bháva_). Not only their religion and literature, but their very language reminded them daily of that relation between the real and seeming world." (Hist A. S. Lit. p. 18). In the view of Max Müller as quoted above, the Hindu mind would seem to be of that realistic cast as the Platonic, whose theory of Ontology viewed all existence as mere phantoms and _precepta_ of sense, and very short of that perfection, which the mind realizes in its meditation or _Yoga_ reveries.

The Hindu Yogi views the visible world exactly in the same light as we have said before, that Plato has represented it in the simile commencing the seventh book of his Republic. "He compares mankind to prisoners in a cave, chained in one particular attitude, so as to behold only an ever-varying multiplicity of shadows, projected through the opening of the cave upon the wall before them, by some unseen realities behind. The philosopher alone, who by training or inspiration, is enabled to turn his face from these visions, and contemplate with his mind, that can at once see the unchangeable reality amidst these transient shadows", Baine on Realism pp. 6 and 7.

V. VARIOUS SIGNIFICATIONS OF YOGA.

The Váchaspati lexicon gives us about fifty different meanings of the word _Yoga_, according to the several branches of art or science to which it appertains, and the multifarious affairs of life in which the word is used either singly or in composition with others. We shall give some of them below, in order to prevent our mistaking any one of these senses for the special signification which the term is made to bear in our system of _Yoga_ meditation.

The word _Yoga_ from the root "_jung_" (Lat.) _Jungere_ means the joining of any two things or numbers together. Amara Kosha gives five different meanings of it as, संयोगे मेलने ध्याने धारने उपायेच; the other Koshas give five others, _viz._, भेषज्ये देह स्थैर्ये कर्मकौशले विश्वासघातकेच ।

1. In Arithmetic it is अङ्क योग or addition, and योग बिभाग is addition and subtraction. 2. In Astronomy the conjunction of planets and stars ग्रहनक्षत्रादि संयोगः 3. In Grammar it is the joining of letters and words सन्धिः समासः 4. In Nyáya it means the power of the parts taken together अवयव शक्तिः, तर्क दीपिका 5. In Mímánsa it is defined to be the force conveyed by the united members of a sentence.

In contemplative philosophy it means; 1. According to Pátanjali,—the suppression of mental functions चित्तवृत्ति निरोधः 2. The Buddhists mean by it—the abstraction of the mind from all objects. सर्वविषयेभ्यः चित्तनिवृत्ति निरोधः । 3. The Vedanta meaning of it is—जीवात्मा परमात्मनोरैक्यं the union of the human soul with the Supreme spirit. 4. Its meaning in the _Yoga_ system is nearly the same, _i. e._, the joining of the vital spirit with the soul; संयोग योगमित्याहुर्जीबिमात्मनोरिति । 5. Every process of meditation is called also as Yoga. योगाङ्ग योग उच्यते ।

Others again use it in senses adapted to their own views and subjects; such as the Vaiseshika philosophy uses it to mean, the fixing of the attention to only one subject by abstracting it from all others आत्मनो व्यावृत्त मनसः संयोगो योग उच्यते । 2. The Rámánuja sect define it as the seeking of one's particular Deity स्वस्व देवतानु सन्धानमिति रामानुजाः ।

In this sense all sectarian cults are accounted as so many kinds of Yogas by their respective votaries. 3. According to some Buddhists it is the seeking of one's object of desire अप्राप्तस्यार्थस्य प्राप्तये पर्यानुयोगः । 4. And with others, it is a search after every desirable object. 5. In Rhetoric it means the union of lovers कामुक कामिनी सम्मेलनं ।

In Medicine it means the compounding of drugs under which head there are many works that are at first sight mistaken for Yoga philosophy. Again there are many compound words with _Yoga_ which mean only "a treatise" on those subjects, such as, works on wisdom, on Acts, on Faith &c., are called ज्ञान योग, क्रिया योग, भक्ति योग इत्यादि ।

Moreover the words _Yoga_ and _Viyoga_ are used to express the two processes of synthesis and analysis both in the abstract and practical sciences for the combination and disjoining of ideas and things.

VI. THE DIFFERENT STAGES OF YOGA.

The constituent parts and progressive steps of Yoga, are composed of a series of bodily, mental and spiritual practices, the proper exercise of which conduces to the making of a perfect man, as a moral, intellectual and spiritual being, to be united to his Maker in the present and future worlds. These are called the eight stages of _Yoga_ (अष्टाङ्ग योग), of which some are external (बहिरङ्ग) and others internal (अन्तरङ्गानि). The external ones are:

_1st._ _Yama_ (यम); Forbearance or restraint of passions, feelings &c., including the best moral rules in all religions.

_2nd._ _Niyama_ (नियम); Particular rules and vows for the observance of the _Yogi_.

_3rd._ _Asana_ (आसन); sedate position of the body to help deep meditation.

_4th._ _Pránáyāma_ (प्राणायाम); Suppression and suspension of breath.

_5th._ _Pratyáhára_ (प्रत्याहार); Restraint or control of senses and organs.

Among the internal practices are reckoned the following; _viz._;

_6th._ _Dhyána_ (ध्यान); Inward contemplation and meditation.

_7th._ _Dhāraná_ (धारणा); Steadiness of the mind in study.

_8th._ _Samádhi_ (समाधि); Trance, the last stage of _Yoga_.

These again comprise some other acts under each of them, such as;

I. _Yama_ (समयम) Restraint includes five acts under it;

_1st._ _Ahimsá_ (अहिंसा); Universal innocence or hurting no animal creature.

_2nd._ _Asteyam_ (अस्तेय); Avoidance of theft or stealth.

_3rd._ _Satyam_ (सत्य); Observance of truth.

- 4th. _Brahmacharyam_ (ब्रह्मचर्य); consisting in purity and chastity.
- 5th. _Aparigraha_ (अपरिग्रह); Disinterestedness.
- II. _Niyama_ (नियम पञ्चधा); Moral rules consisting of five-fold acts. _Viz._;
- 1st. _Saucham_ (शौच); Personal cleanliness.
- 2nd. _Santosha_ (सन्तोष); contentment.
- 3rd. _Tapas_ (तपस्); Devotion including self denial and self mortification.
- 4th. _Sádhyáya_ (साध्याय); knowledge of all nature.
- 5th. _Pranidhána_ (ईश्वर प्रनिधानं); Adoration of God.
- III. _Asana_ (आसन); Different modes of postures, tranquil posture (पद्मासन) &c.
- IV. _Pránáyáma_ (प्राणायाम); Rules of Respiration, three sorts, viz.;
- 1st. _Rechaka_ (रेचक); Expiration or Exhalation.
- 2nd. _Púraka_ (पूरक); Inspiration or Inhalation.
- 3rd. _Kumbhaka_ (कुम्भकं अष्टधा); Suppression of breathing, eight ways.
- V. _Pratyáhára_ (प्रत्याहारः इन्द्रिय निग्रहः); Restraining the senses from their gratifications in many ways.
- VI. _Dhyána_ (ध्यान चित्तनिरोधः); Abstract contemplation, apart from the testimonies of:—
1. Pratyaxa (प्रत्यक्ष); Perceptions.
  2. Pramána (प्रमाण); Apprehensions.
  3. Anumána (अनुमान); Inference.
  4. Sabda (शब्द); Verbal testimony.
- VII. _Dhāranā_ (धारणा); Retentiveness.
- VIII. _Samādhi_ (समाधि); Absorption in meditation, in two ways;
1. _Savikalpa_ (सबिकल्प); With retention of self volition.
  2. _Nirvikalpa_ (निर्विकल्प); With loss of volition.

The Upāyas (उपायाः); Or the means spoken of before are;

1. _Uposhana_ (उपोषण); Abstinence.
2. _Mitāsana_ (मिताशनं); Temperance.
3. _Āsrama_ (आश्रमः); Sheltered abodes.
4. _Visrāma_ (विश्रामः); Rest and repose from labor.
5. _Avarodha_ (अवरोधः); Self confinement in closets.
6. _Asanam_ (अशनं); Subsistence on light food.

Beside these there are many vices called _Apāyas_ or _dóshas_ (अपायादोषाः) which are obstacles to meditation, and which we omit on account of their prolixity.

VII. NATURE OF THE SOUL.

Now as the end and aim of _Yoga_ is the emancipation of the Soul, it is necessary to give some account of the nature of the soul (_átmatatwa_) as far as it was known to the sages of India, and formed the primary subject of inquiry with the wise men of every country according to the sayings; “_Gnothe seauton_,”

"_Nosce teipsum_," "Know thyself", "_Khodra bedan_," and Arabic
"_Taalām Nafsakā_," आत्मानु सन्धीयताम् &c.

"The word Atman," says Max Müller, "which in the Veda occurs as often as "_twan_," meant life, particularly animal life" (Vide Rig Veda I. 63, 8.)
"_Atmā_" in the sense of _self_ occurs also in the Rig Veda (I. 162. 20), in the passage मत्वा-तपत् प्रिय आत्मापियन्त. It is also found to be used in the higher sense of soul in the verse सूर्यो आत्मा जगतस्तदूषश्च "The sun is the soul of all that moves and rests (R. I. 115. 1). The highest soul is called _paramātman_ (परमात्मा) of which all other souls partake, from which all reality in this created world emanates, and into which every thing will return."

_Atman_ originally meant air as the Greek _atmos_, Gothic _ahma_, Zend _tmānam_, Sanscrit त्मानं and आत्मानं, Cuniform _adam_, Persian _dam_, whence we derive Sans. अहं Hindi हम् Uria and Prakrit अमू and Bengali আমি, मुह &c. The Greek and Latin _ego_ and German _ich_ are all derived from the same source. The Romance _je_ and Hindi _ji_ are corruptions of Sanskrit जीब meaning life and spirit. Again the Pāli अत्ता and the Prakrit आप्पा is from the Sanscrit आत्मा, which is आप in Hindi, आपन in Bengali and अप्पन in Uria &c. The Persian "_man_" is evidently the _Sātman_ by elision of the initial syllable.

These meanings of _ātman_ = the self and _ego_ form the basis of the knowledge of the Divine soul both of the Hindu as of any other people, who from the consciousness of their own selves rise to that of the Supreme. Thus says Max Müller on the subject, "A Hindu speaking of himself आत्मन् spoke also, though unconsciously of the soul of the universe परमात्मन्, and to know himself, was to him to know both his own self and the Universal soul, or to know himself in the Divine self."

We give below the different lights in which the Divine soul was viewed by the different schools of Hindu philosophy, and adopted accordingly in their respective modes of Yoga meditation. The Upanishads called it Brahma of eternal and infinite wisdom नित्यं ज्ञानमनन्तं ब्रह्म ।

The Vedantists;—A Being full of intelligence and blissfulness
सच्चिदानन्द स्वरूपं ।

The Sāṅkaras;—A continued consciousness of one self. सनित्योपलब्धि स्वरूपोऽहमात्मा ।
The doctrine of Descartes and Malebranche.

The Materialists—convert the soul to all material forms देहमात्रमिति प्रकृत्यः ।

The Lokāyatas—take the body with intelligence to be the soul;
चैतन्यबिशिष्टः देहमात्मा ।

The Chārvākas—call the organs and sensations as soul; इन्द्रियान्येवात्मेति ।

Do. Another sect—take the cognitive faculties as such; चेतनान्यात्मेत्यपरे चार्वाकाः ।

Do. Others—Understand the mind as soul मनो एवात्मेत्ये ।

Do. Others—call the vital breath as soul प्राण एवात्मा ।

Do. Others—understand the son as soul पुत्र एवात्मा ।

The Digambaras—say, the complete human body is the soul देहपरिमाणमात्मा ।

The Mādhyamikas—take the vacuum for their soul शून्यमेवात्मेति ।

The Yogāchāris—understand the soul to be a transient flash of knowledge in the spirit in meditation. क्षणं विज्ञाणं ।

The Sautrāntas—call it a short inferior knowledge. ज्ञानाकारानुमेय क्षणिक बाह्यार्थः ।

The Vaibhāshikas—take it to be a momentary perception क्षणिक बाह्यार्थमिति वैभाषिकाः ।

The Jainas—take their preceptor to be their soul अध्यापक आत्मा इति जैनाः ।

 188275 The Logicians—A bodiless active and passive agency देहाद्यतिरिक्त संसारी कर्त्ता भोक्तेति ।
 188276
 188277 The Naiyáyikas—understand the spirit to be self manifest प्रकाश्य इति नैयायिकाः ।
 188278
 188279 The Sánkhyas,—call the spirit to be passive, not active भोक्तेब नकर्त्तेति सांख्या ।
 188280
 188281 The Yogis—call Him a separate omnipotent Being अस्ति तद्व्यतिरिक्त ईश्वरः सर्वज्ञः सर्वशक्तिरिति ।
 188282
 188283 The Saivas,—designate the spirit as knowledge itself अनुक्षेत्रज्ञादि पद बेदनीय इति शैवाः । 188284
 188285 The Mayávádis,—style Brahma as the soul ब्रह्मैवात्मेति मायावादिनः ।
 188286
 188287 The Vaiseshikas,—acknowledge two souls—the Vital and Supreme 188288 जीवात्मा परमात्मा च प्रत्यक्ष एव ।
 188289
 188290 The Nyayá says—because the soul is immortal there is a future state 188291 आत्म नित्यत्वे प्रेत्यभाबसिद्धः ।
 188292
 188293 And thus there are many other _theories_ about the nature of the soul.
 188294
 188295 The Atmávádis—spiritualists, consider the existence of the body as 188296 unnecessary to the existence of the soul.

188297 188298 188299 VIII. FINAL EMANCIPATION OR BEATITUDE. 188300 188301

188302 The object of _Yoga_, as already said, being the emancipation of the 188303 soul from the miseries of the world, and its attainment to a state of 188304 highest felicity, it is to be seen what this state of felicity is, which 188305 it is the concern of every man to know, and which the _Yogi_ takes so 188306 much pains to acquire. The Vedantic Yogi, as it is well known, aims at 188307 nothing less than in his absorption in the Supreme Spirit and loosing
 188308 himself in infinite bliss. But it is not so with others, who are averse 188309 to loose the sense of their personal identity, and look forward to a 188310 state of self existence either in this life or next, in which they shall 188311 be perfectly happy. The Yogis of India have various states of this bliss 188312 which they aim at according to the faith to which they belong, as we 188313 shall show below.

 188315 The Vedantic Yogi has two states of bliss in view; _viz._; the one 188316 _inferior_ which is attained in this life by means of knowledge 188317 तत्रामरः जीबन्मुक्ति लक्षणं तत्त्वज्ञानान्तरमेव, and the other _superior_, obtainable after many 188318 births of gradual advancement to perfection परं निःश्रेयसं क्रमेण भवति । 188319

188320 The Chárvákas say, that it is either independence or death that is 188321 bliss. स्वातन्त्र्यं मृत्युर्वा मोक्षः ।
 188322

188323 The Mádhyamikas say; it is extinction of self that is called liberation 188324 आत्मोच्छेदो मोक्षः ।

188326 The Vijnáni philosophers—have it to be clear and elevated understanding 188327 निर्मलज्ञानोदयः ।
 188328

188329 The Arhatas have it in deliverance from all veil and covering 188330 आवरण बिमुक्तिर्मुक्तिः ।

188332 The Mávávádis say, that it is removal of the error of one's 188333 separate existence as a particle of the Supreme spirit
 188334 ब्रह्मांशिकजीबस्य मिथ्याज्ञान निवृत्तिः ।
 188335

188336 The Rámánujas called it to be the knowledge of Vásudeva as cause of all, 188337 वासुदेव ज्ञानं ।

188339 The Mádhyamikas have it for the perfect bliss enjoyed by Vishnu 188340 विष्णोरानन्दं ।

188342 The Ballabhis expect it in sporting with Krishna in heaven

188343 कृष्णेण सह गोलके लीलानुभाबः ।
 188344
 188345 The Pásupatas and Máheswaras place it in the possession of all dignity 188346 परमैश्वर्यम् ।
 188348 The Kápálikas place it in the fond embraces of Hara and Durga
 188349 हरपार्श्वललिङ्गनम् ।
 188351 The Pratyabhijnánis call it to be the perfection of the soul.
 188352 पूर्णात्माभाः ।
 188353
 188354 The Raseswara Vádis have it in the health of body produced by mercury 188355 पारदेन देहस्थैर्यम् ।
 188357 The Vaisesikas seek it in the extinction of all kinds of pain
 188358 दुःखः निवृत्तिरिति कणादादयः ।
 188360 The Mimánsakas view their happiness in heavenly bliss
 188361 स्वर्गादि सुख भोगः ।
 188363 The Sarvajnas say that, it is the continued feeling of highest felicity 188364 नित्य निरतिशय सुखबोधः ।
 188366 The Pánini philologists find it in the powers of speech
 188367 ब्रह्म रूपाया बाण्या दर्शनम् ।
 188368
 188369 The Sánkhyas find it in the union of force with matter
 188370 प्रकृतौ पुरुषस्यावस्थानम् ।
 188371
 188372 The Udásína Atheists have it as consisting in the ignoring of self 188373 identity अहङ्कार निवृत्तिः ।
 188374
 188375 The Pátanjalas view it in the unconnected unity of the soul
 188376 पुरुषस्य निर्लेप कैबल्यम् ।
 188377
 188378 The Persian Sufis call it _ázádigi_ or unattachment of the soul to any 188379 worldly object.

IX. ORIGIN OF YOGA IN THE VEDAS.

188385 [Sidenote: Not in the Vedic Period.]
 188386
 188387 The origin of yoga meditation is placed at a period comparatively less 188388 ancient than the earliest Sanhita or hymnic period of vedic history, 188389 when the Rishis followed the elementary worship of the physical 188390 forces, or the Brahmanic age when they were employed in the ceremonial 188391 observances.
 188392
 188393 [Sidenote: Some _Traces_ of it.]
 188394
 188395 There are however some traces of abstract contemplation "dhyána yoga"
 188396 to be occasionally met with in the early Vedas, where the Rishis are 188397 mentioned to have indulged themselves in such reveries. Thus in the 188398 Rig Veda—129. 4. सतो वन्धुमसति निरविन्दन् हृदि प्रतीष्य कवयो मनीषा ।
 188400 "The poets discovered in their heart, through meditation, the bond of 188401 the existing in the non-existing." M. Müller. A. S. Lit. (p. 19.)
 188402
 188403 [Sidenote: The Gáyatrí Meditation.]
 188404
 188405 We have it explicitly mentioned in the Gáyatrí hymn of the Rig Veda, 188406 which is daily recited by every Brahman, and wherein its author
 188407 Viswámitra "meditated on the glory of the Lord for the illumination of 188408 his understanding" भर्गो देवस्य धीमहि । But this bespeaks a development of 188409 intellectual meditation "_jnana yoga_" only, and not spiritual as there 188410 is no prayer for (मुक्ति) liberation.

[Sidenote: Āranyaka Period.]

It was in the third or Āranyaka period, that the yoga came in vogue with the second class of the Atharva Upanishads, presenting certain phases in its successive stages, as we find in the following analysis of them given by Professor Weber in his History of Ancient Sanskrit Literature. This class of works, he says, is chiefly made up of subjects relating to yoga, as consisting in divine meditation and giving up all earthly connections. (Ibid p. 163).

[Sidenote: Yoga Upanishads.]

To this class belong the Jábála, Katha-sruti, Bhallavi, Samvartasruti, Sannyása, Hansa and Paramhansa Upanishads, Srímaddatta, the Mándukya and Tarkopanishads, and a few others, (Ibid. p. 164). It will exceed our bounds to give an account of the mode of yoga treated in these treatises, which however may be easily gathered by the reader from a reference to the Fifty two Upanishads lately published in this city.

[Sidenote: Their different modes of yoga.]

Beside the above, we find mention of yoga and the various modes of conducting it in some other Upanishads, as given below by the same author and analyst. The Kathopanishad or Kathavallí of the Atharva Veda, treats of the first principles of Deistic Yoga. Ibid. p. 158.

The Garbhopanishad speaks of the Sánkhyā and Pátanjali yoga systems as the means of knowing Náráyana. (Ibid. p. 160). The Brahmaopanishad, says Weber, belongs more properly to the yoga Upanishads spoken of before. (Ibid. p. 161).

The Nirálambopanishad exhibits essentially the yoga stand point according to Dr. Rajendra Lala Mitra (Notices of S. Mss. II 95. Weber's Id. p. 162). The yoga tatwa and yoga sikhá belong to yoga also, and depict the majesty of Ātmá. (Ibid. p. 165).

Among the Sectarian Upanishads will be found the Náráyanopanishad, which is of special significance in relation to the Sánkhyā and Yoga doctrines (Ibid. p. 166).

[Sidenote: Sánkhyā and Pátanjala Yogas.]

It is plain from the recurrence of the word Sánkhyā in the later Upanishads of the Taittiríya and Atharva vedas and in the Nirukta and Bhagavad Gítá, that the Sánkhyā Yoga was long known to the ancients, and the Pátanjala was a further development of it. (Ibid. p. 137).

[Sidenote: Yoga Yájñavalkya.]

Along with or prior to Pátanjali comes the Yoga Sāstra of Yogi Yájñavalkya, the leading authority of the Sātapatha Bráhmaṇa, who is also regarded as a main originator of the yoga doctrine in his later writings. (Ibid. p. 237). Yájñavalkya speaks of his obtaining the Yoga Sāstra from the sun, ज्ञेयञ्चारण्यकमहं यदादित्यादबात्तवान् । योगशास्त्रञ्च मत् प्रोक्तं ज्ञेयं योगमभीप्सता ॥

"He who wishes to attain yoga must know the Āranyaka which I have received from the sun, and the Yoga sāstra which I have taught."

X. RISE OF THE HERETICAL YOGAS.

[Sidenote: The Buddhist and Jain Yogas.]

Beside the Orthodox yoga systems of the Upanishads, we have the Heterodox Yoga Sastras of the Buddhists and Jains completely concordant with those of Yájñavalkya in the Brihad āranyaka and Atharvan Upanishads, (Weber's Id. p. 285).

[Sidenote: The concordance with the Vedantic.]

The points of coincidence of the vedánta yoga with those of Buddhism and Jainism, consist in as much as both of them inculcate the doctrine of the interminable metempsychosis of the human soul, as a consequence of bodily acts, previous to its state of final absorption or utter annihilation, according to the difference in their respective views. Or to explain it more clearly they say that, "The state of humanity in its present, past and future lives, is the necessary result of its own acts "Karma" in previous births."

[Sidenote: The weal or woe of mankind.]

That misery or happiness in this life is the unavoidable sequence of conduct in former states of existence, and that our present actions will determine our states to come; that is, their weal or woe depending solely on the merit or demerit of acts. It is, therefore, one's cessation from action by confining himself to holy meditation, that secures to him his final absorption in the supreme according to the one; and by his nescience of himself that ensures his utter extinction according to the other.

[Sidenote: The Puránic yoga.]

In the Puránic period we get ample accounts of yoga and yogis. The Kurma purana gives a string of names of yoga teachers. The practice of yoga is frequently alluded to in the Vana parva of Mahábhárata. The observances of yoga are detailed at considerable length and strenuously enjoined in the Udyoga parva of the said epic. Besides in modern times we have accounts of yogis in the Sakuntala of Kálidása (VII. 175) and in the Mádhava Málati of Bhava-bhúti (act V.). The Rámayana gives an account of a Súdra yogi, and the Bhágavatgítá treats also of yoga as necessary to be practiced (chap. VI. V. 13).

[Sidenote: The Tántrika yoga.]

The Tantras or cabalistic works of modern times are all and every one of them no other than yoga sastras, containing directions and formulas for the adoration of innumerable deities for the purpose of their votaries' attainment of consummation "Yoga Siddhi" through them. It is the Tántrika yoga which is chiefly current in Bengal, though the old forms may be in use in other parts of the country. It is reckoned with the heretical systems, because the processes and practices of its yoga are mostly at variance with the spiritual yoga of old. It has invented many múdras or masonic signs, monograms and mysterious symbols, which are wholly unintelligible to the yogis of the old school, and has the carnal rites of the pancha-makára for immediate consummation which a spiritualist will feel ashamed to learn (See Wilson. H. Religion).

[Sidenote: The Hatha Yoga.]

This system, which as its name implies consists of the forced contortions of the body in order to subdue the hardy boors to quiescence, is rather a training of the body than a mental or spiritual discipline of a moral and intelligent being for the benefit of the rational soul. The votaries of this system are mostly of a vagrant and mendicant order, and subject to the slander of foreigners, though they command veneration over the ignorant multitude.

[Sidenote: The Sectarian yogas.]

The modern sectarians in upper Hindustan, namely the followers of Rámánuja, Gorakhnáth, Nának, Kabir and others, possess their respective modes of yoga, written in the dialects of Hindi, for their practice in the maths or monasteries peculiar to their different orders.

[Sidenote: Yoga an indigene of India.]

Lux-ab-oriens. "Light from the east:" and India has given more light to the west than it has derived from that quarter. We see India in Greece in many things, but not Greece in India in any. And when we see a correspondence of the Asiatic with the European, we have more reason to suppose its introduction to the west by its travellers to the east, since the days of Alexander the Great, than the Indians' importation of any thing from Europe, by crossing the seas which they had neither the means nor privilege to do by the laws of their country. Whatever, therefore, the Indian has is the indigenous growth of the land, or else they would be as refined as the productions of Europe are generally found to be.

Professor Monier Williams speaking of the yoga philosophy says; "The votaries of animal magnetism, clairvoyance and so called spiritualism, will find most of their theories represented or far outdone by corresponding notions existing in the _yoga_ system for more than two thousand years ago." In speaking of the Vedanta he declares; "The philosophy of the Sufis, alleged to be developed out of the Koran, appears to be a kind of pantheism very similar to that of the Vedanta." He has next shewn the correspondence of its doctrines with those of Plato. Again he says about the Sánkhyas; "It may not be altogether unworthy of the attention of Darwinians" (Ind. Wisdom).

[Sidenote: The yoga &c. in Greece.]

The Dialectic Nyáya in the opinion of Sir William Jones expressed in his Discourse on Hindu philosophy, was taken up by the followers of Alexander and communicated by them to Aristotle: and that Pythagoras derived his doctrine of Metempsychosis from the Hindu _yoga_ in his travels through India. His philosophy was of a contemplative cast from the sensible to the immaterial Intelligibles.

[Sidenote: The Gnostic yoga.]

Weber says; "The most flourishing epoch of the Sánkhyas-yoga, belongs most probably to the first centuries of our eras, the influence it exercised upon the development of gnosticism in Asia Minor being unmistakable; while further both through that channel and afterwards directly also, it had an important influence upon the growth of Sophi-philosophy" (See Lassen I. A. K. & Gildemeister, Scrip. Arab. de rebus indicis loci et opuscula.)

[Sidenote: Yoga among Moslems.]

It was at the beginning of the 11th century that Albiruni translated Pátanjali's work (Yoga-Sútra) into Arabic, and it would appear the Sánkhyas Sútras also; though the information we have of the contents of these works, do not harmonize with the sanskrit originals. (Reinaud Journal Asiatique and H. M. Elliot Mahomedan History of India. Weber's Ind. Lit. p. 239).

[Sidenote: Buddhistic Yoga in Europe.]

The Gnostic doctrines derived especially from Buddhistic missions through Persia and Punjab, were spread over Europe, and embraced and cultivated particularly by Basilides, Valentinian, and Bardesanes as well as Manes.

[Sidenote: Manechian Doctrines.]

It is, however, a question as to the amount of influence to be ascribed to Indian philosophy generally, in shaping these gnostic doctrines of Manes in particular, was a most important one, as has been shown by Lassen III. 415. Beal. I. R. A. S. II. 424. Web. Ind. Lit. p. 309.

[Sidenote: Buddhist and Sánkhyas yogas.]

It must be remembered that Buddhism and its yoga are but offshoots of Sáṅkhya yoga, and sprung from the same place the _Kapila Vástu_.

XII. DIFFERENT ASPECTS OF YOGA.

[Sidenote: Varieties of yoga.]

The Yoga system will be found, what Monier Williams says of Hinduism at large, "to present its spiritual and material aspects, its esoteric and exoteric, its subjective and objective, its pure and impure sides to the observer." "It is," he says, "at once vulgarly pantheistic, severely monotheistic, grossly polytheistic and coldly atheistic. It has a side for the practical and another for the devotional and another for the speculative." Again says he; "Those, who rest in ceremonial observances, find it all satisfying; those, who deny the efficacy of works and make faith the one thing needful, need not wander from its pale; those, who delight in meditating on the nature of God and man, the relation of matter and spirit, the mystery of separate existence and the origin of evil, may here indulge their love of speculation." (Introduction to Indian Wisdom p. xxvii.)

We shall treat of these _seriatim_, by way of notes to or interpretation of the above, as applying to the different modes of yoga practised by these several orders of sectarians.

That the earliest form of _yoga_ was purely spiritual, is evident from the Upanishads, the Vedānta doctrines of Vyāsa and all works on the knowledge of the _soul_ (adhyā́tma Vidyá). "All the early Upanishads", says Weber, "teach the doctrine of _átmá_-spirit, and the later ones deal with yoga meditation to attain complete union with _átmá_ or the Supreme Spirit." Web. Ind. Lit. p. 156. "The _átmá_ soul or self and the supreme spirit (paramátmá) of which all other souls partake, is the spiritual object of meditation (yoga)." Max Müller's A. S. Lit. p. 20. Yajñavalkya says; आत्माबारे द्रष्टव्य ओतव्य मन्तव्य निदिध्यासितव्यः ।

"The Divine Spirit is to be seen, heard, perceived and meditated upon &c." If we see, hear, perceive and know Him, then this whole universe is known to us. A. S. Lit. p. 23. Again, "Whosoever looks for Brahmahood elsewhere than in the Divine Spirit, should be abandoned. Whosoever looks for _Kshatra_ power elsewhere than in the Divine Spirit, should be abandoned. This Brahmahood, this Kshatra power, this world, these gods, these beings, this universe, all is Divine Spirit." Ibid. The meaning of the last passage is evidently that, the spirit of God pervades the whole, and not that these are God; for that would be pantheism and materialism; whereas the Sruti says that, "God is to be worshipped in spirit and not in any material object." आत्मा आत्मन्येवोपासितव्यः ।

The materialistic side of the yoga, or what is called the _Prákritika_ yoga, was propounded at first in the _Sáṅkhya yoga_ system, and thence taken up in the Purānas and _Tantras_, which set up a primeval matter as the basis of the universe, and the _purusha_ or animal soul as evolved out of it, and subsisting in matter. Weber's Ind. Lit. p. 235.

[Sidenote: Of Matter-Prakriti.]

Here, the _avyakta_-matter is reckoned as prior to the _purusha_ or animal soul; whereas in the Vedānta the _purusha_ or primeval soul is considered as prior to the _avyakta_-matter. The Sáṅkhya, therefore, recognizes the adoration of matter as its yoga, and its founder Kapila was a yogi of this kind. Later materialists meditate on the material principles and agencies as the causes of all, as in the Vidyanmoda Taranginí; प्रकृतिस्तेमहत्तत्त्वं सम्बर्द्धयतुसर्ब्बदा ।

[Sidenote: Of Spirit—Purusha.]

These agencies were first viewed as concentrated in a male form, as in the persons of Buddha, Jina and Siva, as described in the Kumára Sambhava आत्मानमात्मन्यबलोकदन्तः; and when in the female figure of _Prakriti_ or nature personified, otherwise called Saktirupá or the personification of energy, as in the Devi mähátmya; या देवी सर्वभूतेषु शक्तिरूपेण संस्थिता &c. They were afterwards viewed in the five elements panchabhúta, which formed the elemental worship of the ancients, either singly or conjointly as in the pancha-bhāutikā upāsanā, described in the Sarva darsana sangraha.

[Sidenote: Nature worship in eight forms.]

The materialistic or nature worship was at last diversified into eight forms called ashta mūrti, consisting of earth, water, fire, air, sky, sun, moon, and the sacrificial priest, which were believed to be so many forms of God Ísa, and forming the objects of his meditation also. The eight forms are summed up in the lines; जलं सूर्योमहीबह्निः बायुराकाशमेव च । दीक्षितो ब्राह्मणः सोमः इत्यष्टौ तनवः स्मृताः । or as it is more commonly read in Bengal, क्षितिर्जलं तथा तेजो वायुराकाशमेव च । याज्ञिकार्कस्तथा चन्द्रो मूर्तिरष्टौ हरस्य च । That they were forms of Ísa is thus expressed by Kálidása in the Raghu-vansa; अवेहि मां किङ्करमष्ट मूर्तेः । कुम्भोद्भूतो नाम निकुम्भमित्रं; and that they were meditated upon by him as expressed by the same in his Kumára Sambhava;

तत्राग्निमाधाय समित् समिद्धं । स्वमेव मूर्त्यन्तरमष्ट मूर्तिः ॥

The prologue to the Sakuntalá will at once prove this great poet to have been a materialist of this kind; thus;

या सृष्टिः स्रष्टु राद्या बहति बिधि हुतं या हविर्याचहोत्री ।
ये द्वेकालं बिधत्तः श्रुतिबिषयगुणा यास्थिता व्याप्य विश्वम् ॥
या माहुः प्रकृतिरिति यया प्रणिनः प्रणबन्तः ।
प्रसन्नस्तनुभिरबतु बस्ताभिरष्टभिरीशः ॥

"Water the first work of the creator, and Fire which receives the oblations ordained by law &c. &c. May Ísa, the God of Nature, apparent in these forms, bless and sustain you."

Besides all this the Sivites of the present day, are found to be votaries of this materialistic faith in their daily adoration of the eight forms of Siva in the following formula of their ritual;

१ सर्वाय क्षिति मूर्तये नमः ।      २ भवाय जल मूर्तये नमः ।
३ रुद्राय अग्नि मूर्तये नमः ।      ४ उग्राय वायु मूर्तये नमः ।
५ भीमाय आकाश मूर्तये नमः ।      ६ पशुपतये यजमान मूर्तये नमः ।
७ महादेवाय सोम मूर्तये नमः ।      ८ ईशानाय सूर्य मूर्तये नमः ॥

Both the Sākhya and Saiva materialism are deprecated in orthodox works as atheistic and heretical, like the impious doctrines of the modern positivists and materialists of Europe, on account of their disbelief in the existence of a personal and spiritual God. Thus says, Kumārila; सांख्ययोग पाञ्चरात्र पाशुपत शास्त्रा निरर्थपरिगृहीत धर्मार्थनिवन्धनानि (Max Müller's A. S. Lit. p. 78.)

[Sidenote: 3. The Esoteric "Jnána yoga."]

It is the occult and mystic meditation of the Divinity, practised by religious recluses after their retirement from the world in the deep recesses of forests, according to the teachings of the Áranyakas of the Vedas. In this sense it is called "Alaukika" or recluse, as opposed to the "laukika" or the popular form. It is as well practicable in domestic circles by those that are qualified to practise the "Jnána yoga" (ज्ञानयोग) or transcendental speculation at their leisure. Of the former kind were the Rishis Sūka deva, Yājñavalkya and others, and of the latter sort were the royal personages Janaka and other kings and the sages Vasistha, Vyása and many more of the "munis."

[Sidenote: 4. The Exoteric Rāja yoga.]

This is the "laukika" or popular form of devotion practised chiefly by the outward formulæ—vahirangas_ of yoga, with observance of the customary rites and duties of religion. The former kind called Vidyā_ (विद्या) and the latter Avidyā_ (अविद्या), are enjoined to be performed together in the Veda, which says: यत्तद्वेदोभयं सह &c. The Bhagavadgītā says to the same effect, न कर्मणा मनारम्य नैष्कर्म्यं पुरुषो श्रुते. The yoga Vāsishtha inculcates the same doctrine in conformity with the Sruti which says: अन्धतममप्रविशन्ति ये उ बिद्यायां रताः । ततो भूय एव ते तमो ये उ बिद्यायां रताः ।

[Sidenote: 5. The Subjective or Hansa yoga.]

The hansa_ or paramahansa_ yoga is the subjective form, which consists in the perception of one's identity with that of the supreme being, whereby men are elevated above life and death. (Weber's Ind. Lit. p. 157.) The formula of meditation is "soham, hansah_" (सोऽहं हंसः) I am He, Ego sum Is_, and the Arabic "Anal Haq_"; wherein the Ego is identified with the absolute_.

The objective side of yoga is clearly seen in its formula of tat twam asi—"thou art He." Here "thou" the object of cognition—a non ego_, is made the absolute subjective (Weber. Ind. Lit. p. 162). This formula is reduced to one word tatwam_ तत्त्वं denoting "truth," which contained in viewing every thing as Himself, or having subordinated all cosmical speculations to the objective method.

[Sidenote: 7. The Pure yoga-Suddha Brahmacharyam.]

The pure Yoga has two meanings viz.; the holy and unmixed forms of it. The former was practised by the celibate Brahmachāris and Brahmachārinis of yore, and is now in practice with the Kānphutta yogis_ and yoginis_ of Katiyawar in Guzerat and Bombay. Its unmixed form is found among the Brahmavādīs_ and Vādinis_, who practise the pure contemplative yoga of Vedānta without any intermixture of sectarian forms. It corresponds with the philosophical mysticism of saint Bernard, and the mystic devotion of the Sufis of Persia. (See Sir Wm. Jones. On the Mystic Poetry of the Hindus, Persians and Greeks.)

[Sidenote: 8. The Impure or Bhandā yoga.]

The impure yoga in both its significations of unholiness and intermixture, is now largely in vogue with the followers of the tantras_, the worshippers of Siva and Sakti, the modern Gosavis of Deccan, the Bullabhāchāris of Brindaban, the Gosains, Bhairavis and Vaishnava sects in India, the Aghoris of Hindustan, and the Kartābhajās and Nerā-neris_ of Bengal.

[Sidenote: 9. The Pantheistic or Visvātmā yoga.]

This is well known from the pantheistic doctrines of Vedānta, to consist in the meditation of every thing in God and God in every thing; "Sarvam khalvidam Brahma_" सर्वं खल्विदं ब्रह्म । एतद्वैतत; and that such contemplation alone leads to immortality. भूतेषु भूतेषु विचिन्त्य धीरः प्रेत्यास्मात्लोकादमृता भवन्ति । It corresponds with the pantheism of Persian Sufis and those of Spinoza and Tindal in the west. Even Sadi says; "Hamān nestand unche hasti tui_" there is nothing else but thyself. So in Urdu, Jo kuch hai ohi hai nahin aur kuchh_.

[Sidenote: 10. The Monotheistic or Adwaita Brahma yoga.]

It consists in the meditation of the creed ओं एकमेव वा द्वितीयं of the Brahmans, like the "Wahed Ho" of Moslems, and that God is one of Unitarian Christians. The monotheistic yoga is embodied in the Svetāswatara and other Upanishads (Weber p. 252 a). As for severe monotheism the Mosaic and Moslem religions are unparalleled, whose tenet it is "la sharik laho_" one without a partner; and, "Thou shalt have no other God but Me."

[Sidenote: 11. The Dualistic or _Dwaita yoga_.]

The dualistic yoga originated with Patanjali, substituting his _Isvara_ for the _Purusha_ of Sāṅkhya, and taking the _Prakriti_ as his associate. "From these," says Weber, "the doctrine seems to rest substantially upon a dualism of the _Purusha_ male and _avyakta_ or Prakriti—the female." This has also given birth to the dualistic faith of the _androgynous_ divinity—the Protogonus of the Greek mythology, the _ardhanārīswara_ of Manu, the undivided Adam of the scriptures, the Hara-Gauri and Umā-Maheswara of the Hindu Śāktas. But there is another dualism of two male duties joined in one person of _Hari-hara_ or _Hara-hari_ ; whose worshippers are called _dwaita-vādis_ , and among whom the famous grammarian Vopadeva ranks the foremost.

[Sidenote: 12. The Trialistic or _Traita-yoga_.]

The doctrines of the Hindu trinity of Brahma, Vishnu and Siva, and that of the Platonic triad and Christian Holy Trinity are well known to inculcate the worship and meditation of the three persons in one, so that in adoring one of them, a man unknowingly worships all the three together.

[Sidenote: 13. The Polytheistic yoga or _Sarva Devopāsana_.]

This consists of the adoration of a plurality of deities in the mythology by every Hindu, though every one has a special divinity of whom he is the votary for his particular meditation. The later upanishads have promulgated the worship of several forms of Vishnu and Siva (Web. I. Lit. p. 161); and the _Tantras_ have given the _dhyānas_ or forms of meditation of a vast number of deities in their various forms and images (Ibid. p. 236).

[Sidenote: 14. The Atheistic or _Nirīswara_ yoga.].

The Atheistic yoga is found in the _nirīswara_ or hylo-theistic system of Kapila, who transmitted his faith "in nothing" to the Buddhists and Jains, who having no God to adore, worship themselves, in sedate and silent meditation. (Monier Williams, Hindu Wisdom p. 97).

[Sidenote: 15. The Theistic or _Āstikya yoga_.]

The Theistic yoga system of Patanjali: otherwise called the _śeṣwara_ yoga, was ingrafted on the old atheistic system of Sāṅkhya with a belief in the Iswara. It is this system to which the name yoga specially belongs. (Weber's Ind. Lit. pp. 238 and 252).

[Sidenote: 16. The Practical _Yoga Sādhana_.]

"The yoga system," says Weber, "developed itself in course of time in outward practices of penance and mortifications, whereby absorption in the Supreme Being was sought to be obtained. We discover its early traces in the Epics and specially in the Atharva upanishads." (Ind. Lit. p. 239). The practical _yoga Sādhana_ is now practised by every devotee in the service of his respective divinity.

[Sidenote: 17. The devotional or _Sannyāsa yoga_.]

The devotional side of the yoga is noticed in the instance of Janaka in the Mahābhārata, and of Yājñavalkya in the Brihadāranyaka in the practice of their devotions in domestic life. These examples may have given a powerful impetus to the yogis in the succeeding ages, to the practice of secluded yoga in ascetism and abandonment of the world, and its concerns called Sannyāsa as in the case of Chaitanya and others.

[Sidenote: 18. The Speculative _Dhyāna yoga_.]

It had its rise in the first or earliest class of Upanishads, when the minds of the Rishis were employed in speculations about their future state and immortality, and about the nature and attributes of the Supreme Being.

[Sidenote: 19. The Ceremonial or Kriyá yoga.]

This commenced with the second class or medieval upanishads, which gave the means and stages, whereby men may even in this world attain complete union with the Átma (Web. I. Lit. p. 156). The yogáchara of Manu relates to the daily ceremonies of house-keepers, and the Kriyá yoga of the Puránas treats about pilgrimages and pious acts of religion.

[Sidenote: 20. The Pseudo or Bhákta yoga.]

The pure yoga being perverted by the mimicry of false pretenders to sanctity and holiness, have assumed all those degenerate forms which are commonly to be seen in the mendicant Fakirs, strolling about with mock shows to earn a livelihood from the imposed vulgar. These being the most conspicuous have infused a wrong notion of yoga into the minds of foreigners.

[Sidenote: 21. The Bhakti yoga.]

The Bhakti yoga first appears in the Swetáswatara Upanishad where the Bhakti element of faith shoots forth to light (Web. Ind. Lit. pp. 252 and 238). It indicates acquaintance with the corresponding doctrine of Christianity. The Bhágavad Gítá lays special stress upon faith in the Supreme Being. It is the united opinion of the majority of European scholars, that the Hindu Bhakti is derived from the faith (fides) of Christian Theology. It has taken the place of श्रद्धा or belief among all sects, and has been introduced of late in the Brahma Samájas with other Vaishnava practices.

The other topics of Prof. Monier Williams being irrelevant to our subject, are left out from being treated in the present dissertation.

XIII. THE CONSUMMATION OF YOGA (SIDDHI).

[Sidenote: 22. By assimilation to the object.]

The Yogi by continually meditating on the perfections of the All Perfect Being, becomes eventually a perfect being himself, just as a man that devotes his sole attention to the acquisition a particular science, attains in time not only to a perfection in it, but becomes as it were identified with that science. Or to use a natural phenomenon in the metamorphoses of insects, the transformation of the cockroach to the conchfly, by its constant dread of the latter when caught by it, and the cameleon's changing its colour for those of the objects about it, serve well to elucidate the Brahmahood ब्रह्मभूयः of the contemplative yogi.

But to illustrate this point more clearly we will cite the argument of Plotinus of the Neo-Platonic school, to prove the elevation of the meditative yogi to the perfection of the Being he meditates upon. He says, "Man is a finite being, how can he comprehend the Infinite? But as soon as he comprehends the Infinite, he is infinite himself: that is to say; he is no longer himself, no longer that finite being having a consciousness of his own separate existence; but is lost in and becomes one with the Infinite."

[Sidenote: By identification with the object.]

Here says Mr. Lewes, "If I attain to a knowledge of the Infinite, it is not by my reason which is finite, but by some higher faculty which identifies itself with its object. Hence the identity of subject and object, of the thought and the thing thought of ज्ञाताज्ञानपरिक्थं is the only possible ground of knowledge. Knowledge and Being are identical, and to know more is to be more". But says Plotinus; "If knowledge is the same as the thing known, the finite as finite, can never know the Infinite, because he cannot be Infinite". Hist. Phil. I. p. 391.

[Sidenote: By meditation of Divine attributes.]

Therefore the yogi takes himself as his preliminary step, to the meditations of some particular attribute or perfection of the deity, to which he is assimilated in thought, which is called his state of lower perfection; until he is prepared by his highest degree of ecstasy to lose the sense of his own personality, and become absorbed in the Infinite Intelligence called his ultimate consummation or Samádhi, which makes him one with the Infinite, and unites the knower and the known together; ज्ञाताज्ञेययोरैक्यं।

[Sidenote: The Sufi Perfection.]

The perfection of the yogi bears a striking resemblance with maarfát of the Sufis of Persia, and it is described at length by Al-Gazzali, a famous sophist, of which we have an English translation given by G. K. Lewes in his History of Philosophy. (Vol. II. p. 55). "From the very first the Sufis have such astonishing revelations, that they are enabled, while waking, to see visions of angels and the souls of prophets; they hear their voices and receive their favours."

[Sidenote: Ultimate consummation]

"Afterwards a transport exalts them beyond the mere perception of forms, to a degree which exceeds all expression, and concerning which one cannot speak without employing a language that would sound blasphemous. In fact some have gone so far as to imagine themselves amalgamated with God, others identified with Him, and others to be associated with Him." These states are called स्वरूप, सायुज्य &c., in Hindu yoga as we shall presently see.

XIV. THE DIFFERENT DEGREES OF PERFECTION.

[Sidenote: The Eight perfections. अष्ट सिद्धिः।]

"The supernatural faculties" says Wilson, "are acquired in various degrees according to the greater or lesser perfection of the adept." H. Rel. p. 131. These perfections are commonly enumerated as eight in number (अष्ट सिद्धिः।), and are said to be acquired by the particular mode in which the devotee concentrates himself in the Divine spirit or contemplates it within himself.

[Sidenote: 1. Microcosm or Animá.]

The specific property of the minuteness of the soul or universal spirit, that it is minuter than the minutest (अण रणीयान्). By thinking himself as such, the yogi by a single expiration of air, makes his whole body assume a lank and lean appearance, and penetrates his soul into all bodies.

[Sidenote: 2. Macrocosm or Mahimá.]

This also is a special quality of the soul that it fills the body, and extends through all space and encloses it within itself (महतो महीयान्); by thinking so, the yogi by a mere respiration of air makes his body round and turgid as a frog, and comprehends the universe in himself.

[Sidenote: 3. Lightness or Laghimá.]

From thinking on the lightness of the soul, the yogi produces a diminution of his specific gravity by swallowing large draughts of air, and thereby keeps himself in an aerial posture both on sea and land. This the Sruti says as (लघोर्लघीयान्).

[Sidenote: 4. Gravity or _Garimá_.]

This practice is opposed to the above, and it is by the same process of swallowing great draughts of air, and compressing them within the system, that the yogi acquires an increase of his specific gravity or _garimá_ (गुरोगरीयान्). Krishna is said to have assumed his विश्वम्भर मूर्ति in this way, which preponderated all weights in the opposite scale.

[Sidenote: 5. Success or _Prápti_.]

This is the obtaining of desired objects and supernatural powers as by inspiration from above. The yogi in a state of trance acquires the power of predicting future events, of understanding unknown languages, of curing divers diseases, of hearing distant sounds, of divining unexpressed thoughts of others, of seeing distant objects, or smelling mystical fragrant odours, and of understanding the language of beasts and birds. Hence the prophets all dived into futurity, the oracles declared future events, Jina understood _pasubháshá_, and Christ healed diseases and infirmities. So also Sanjaya saw the battles waged at Kurukshetra from the palace of king Dhritaráshtra.

[Sidenote: 6. Overgain—_PraKámya_.]

Prakámya is obtaining more than one's expectations, and consists in the power of casting the old skin and maintaining a youth-like appearance for an unusual period of time, as it is recorded of king Yayáti (Japhet or Jyápati); and of Alcibiades who maintained an unfading youth to his last. By some writers it is defined to be the property of entering into the system of another person; as it is related of Sankarácharya's entering the dead body of prince Amaru in the Sankara Vijaya.

[Sidenote: 7. Subjection _Vasitwam_.]

This is the power of taming living creatures and bringing them under control. It is defined also to be the restraint of passions and emotions as रागादि बशित्वं, and likewise the bringing of men and women under subjection. This made Orpheus tame the wild animals and stop the course of rivers by the music of his lyre, and gave Pythagoras (who derived it from India) the power of subduing a furious bear by the influence of his will or word, as also of preventing an ox from eating his beans, and stopping an eagle in its flight. It was by this that Prospero subdued the elements and aerial spirits with his magic wand, and Draupadi and Mahommed obtained the powers of stopping the courses of the sun and moon. The Magis of Persia are said to have derived their magical powers from the Máyis of India who first cultivated the magical art.

It is the obtaining of universal dominion either in this life or next by means of yoga, as it is recorded of Rávana, Mándhátá and others in the traditions. It is also said to be the attainment of divine powers, when the yogi finds himself in a blaze of light.

XV. THE STATE OF A PERFECT YOGI.

[Sidenote: Authority of H. H. Wilson]

When the mystic union is effected, he (the yogi) can make himself lighter than the lightest substance, and heavier than the heaviest; can become as vast or as minute as he pleases; can traverse all space, can animate any dead body by transferring his spirit into it from his own frame. He can render himself invisible, can attain all objects, become equally acquainted with the present, past and future, and is finally 189102 united with Siva, and consequently exempted from being born again upon 189103 earth. (See Wilson's Hindu Religion p. 131).

189105 [Sidenote: Ditto of Plato.]
189106

189107 We find the same doctrine in Plato's Phaedrus where Socrates delivers 189108 a highly poetical effusion respecting the partial intercourse or the 189109 human soul with eternal intellectual Realia. He says moreover that,
189110 all objects which are invisible can be apprehended only by cogitation
189111 (yoga); and that none but philosophers (yogis), and a few of them 189112 can attain such mental energy during this life (जीबन्मुक्ति); nor 189113 even they fully and perfectly in the present state. But they will 189114 attain it fully after death; if their lives have been passed in sober
189115 philosophical training (ध्यानज्ञान). And that all souls enjoyed it 189116 before birth, before junction with the body, which are forgotten during 189117 childhood, but recalled in the way of reminiscence by association.
189118 The revival of the divine elements is an inspiration of the nature of 189119 madness (trance or ecstasy of the yoga). The soul becoming insensible 189120 to ordinary pursuits, contracts a passionate tendency to the universal.
189121 (Baine on Realism. pp. 6 and 7).

189123 [Sidenote: Authority of Plotinus.]
189124

189125 "It is ecstasy the faculty by which the soul divests itself of its 189126 personality. In this state the soul becomes loosened from its material 189127 prison, separated from individual consciousness, and becomes absorbed 189128 in the Infinite Intelligence from which it emanated. In this ecstasy it 189129 contemplates real existence; and identifies itself with that which it 189130 contemplates." (Lewes. Hist. of Philosophy Vol. I. p. 389).

189135 XVI. CRITICISM ON YOGA PRACTICE.

189137

189138 [Sidenote: Disbelief in yoga.]
189139

189140 Notwithstanding all that we have said and the authorities we have 189141 cited in the preceding article on the efficacy of yoga, we find some 189142 scholars in Europe and many educated men in this country, are disposed 189143 to discredit the efficiency of yoga to effect supernatural results or 189144 to be good for any thing. We shall state some of these objections which 189145 will be found to bear their own refutation on the grounds of their 189146 misrepresentation and self-contradiction.
189147

189148 [Sidenote: Its painful practices.]
189149

189150 Professor Monier Williams says that, "yoga system appears, in fact, 189151 to be a mere contrivance of getting rid of all thought, or at least 189152 of concentrating the mind with the utmost intensity upon nothing in 189153 particular. It is a strange compound of mental and bodily exercises
189154 consisting of unnatural restraint, forced and painful postures, 189155 twistings and contortions of the limbs, suppression of breath and 189156 utter absence of mind". (Indian wisdom p. 103) (so also Wilson's Hindu 189157 Religion p. 132).
189158

189159 [Sidenote: Its questionable Features.]
189160

189161 He then starts the question, "How is it that faith in a false system
189162 can operate with sufficient force upon the Hindu, to impel him to 189163 submit voluntarily to almost incredible restraints, mortifications of 189164 the flesh and physical tortures? How is it that an amount of physical 189165 endurance may be exhibited by an apparently weakly and emaciated
189166 Asiatic, which would be impossible to a European, the climate and diet 189167 in one case tending to debilitate and in the other to invigorate?"
189168 (Ibid p. 104).

189170 [Sidenote: Their Illegitimacy.]

Professor Monier's statement of the existence of the aforesaid self mortifications and voluntary contortions of the limbs of the yogis for two thousand years or since the invention of yoga philosophy, is open to refutation on the ground of there being no mention of them in the old systems of yoga inculcated either in the Vedānta or Patanjali's philosophy, or even in the yoga Vāsishtha, as it is evident from the practices and processes of yoga we have already given before. Those processes are seen to be simply moral restraints, and no physical torture of any kind, and such moral restraints must be acknowledged on all hands, to be indispensable to the concentration of the mind on any subject of far less importance than the contemplation of the inscrutable nature of the Divinity.

[Sidenote: Abuses of Hatha yoga.]

The abuses he speaks of must be those of the arduous practices of the Hatha yoga, which have been in vogue with pseudo yogis of the later times, from their superstitious belief in bodily tortures as their best penance and only means, (as the author himself avows), "of their fancied attainment of extraordinary sanctity and supernatural powers." (Ibid). But such practices as have degenerated to deceptive tricks in this country, and are carried on by the cheating and cheated fools under the false name of yoga, present their counterparts also in the trickeries of the fanatics and fakirs under every form of faith on earth, without affecting the true religion or creating any misconception of the yoga doctrine.

In vindication of our spiritual yoga we have to say that it is no exoteric religion, and requires no bodily mortification or sacrifice in any shape whatever, as it is the usual practice of all forms of religion among mankind. The yoga is the speculative training of the human soul, and concerns the castigation of the spirit and not the mortification of flesh. It has nothing to do with the body which is of this earth, and which we have to leave here behind us.

[Sidenote: Sacrifice of the Body.]

The universal doom of death pronounced on the original guilt of man, is not to be averted by physical death or any deadly torture of the body, as it is commonly believed by the bulk of mankind, to consist in bodily mortifications and sacrifices; but in the contrition and penitence of the spirit, and sacrifice of the soul as the only sin-offering for the atonement of our original and actual transgressions. The Purusha medha sacrifice of the Veda which is misunderstood for the offering of a male-being, a man, a horse, a bull or a he-goat or male of any animal, meant originally the sacrifice of the human soul, or self-immolation of the purusha or embodied intelligence to the Supreme Spirit, by means of its concentration into the same through the instrumentality of yoga abstraction. Dr. K. M. Banerjia's interpretation of the Purusha medha as typical of the crucifixion of Christ, is more conformable with his Christian view of the mysticism, than the spiritual sense of self-sacrifice, in which it is generally understood by the speculative Yogi and the philosophical Vedantist.

THE OM TAT SAT.

[Sidenote: 1. Preamble of Om tat sat.]

After consideration of Yoga the title of our work, and all its component parts tending to the exercise of meditation, together with an investigation into the nature of Ātman or soul, as the agent of the act of meditating and procuring its salvation, we are led by a natural and coherent train of thought to an inquiry into the nature of that grand object of our holy and profound meditation, which is the only means of our emancipation, and which is presented at once to our view in the exordium of the work in the mystical characters of _Om Tat Sat = On Id Est_.

[Sidenote: 2. Ambiguity of the word _Om_.]

The word _Om_ forming the initial of the said epigraph standing prominent at the top of the opening page of the work, and being more than a multinyous term and ambiguous in its acceptations, requires to be treated at some length, in order to discover the hidden meaning lying buried under that mystic emblem of the grand arcanum of Brahmanical and Universal religion, from amidst a variety of significations which are heaped upon it in the sacred writings and holy speculations of the early sages of India.

THE SRUTI SAYS:—

[Sidenote: 3. In the beginning was the word _Om_.]

ॐमित्येवमग्रमासीत् । प्रथमं मोङ्कारात्मकमासीत् । तस्माच्च निःसृताः सर्व्वे, प्रलीयन्ते तत्रैव । So saith the Holy scripture:—

"In the beginning was the word, the _word_ was with God, and the _word_ was God. All this was made by him, and without him was not anything made, that was made and" St. John 1.1-3.

[Sidenote: Om, the light of the world.]

And again says the Sruti दीप्यतां ज्योतिः । तत्तेजोऽनेनैवमित्येव तदुद्बुध्यति । मैत्री उप ७ । ११

"That _Om_ shone forth as light, but they received it not, and hid it in darkness." So the Scripture:—

"That was the light of the world, and the light shone upon the world, but the world knew it not &c." St. John, Ch 1, V. 5. 9. 10.

[Sidenote: 5. Its Revelation to mankind.]

Again says the Scripture:—"God sent one to bear witness of the light, that all men through him might believe." Id 1.7. So Brahmá the god revealed its meaning to his first begotten son _Atharvan_, and Atharvan, the Prajapati, gave instruction on the subject to _Pippaláda_, _Sanatkumára_ and _Angira_ (Weber A. S. L., p. 164). Again _Angirás_, who communicated it to _Saunaka_, had obtained it from Bharadvāja Satyaváha, and the latter again from _Ángira_, the pupil of _Atharvan_, to whom it was revealed by _Brahmá_ himself (Weber A. S. L., p. 158).

[Sidenote: 6. Works on its Disquisition.]

Hence it is the _Atharva Sikhá Upanishad_ in which the investigation of the sacred word _Om_ is principally conducted apart from those of the _Mándukya_, _Maitrí_ and _Táraka_ Upanishads. (Web. Id., p. 164). These together with their Bháshyas by Sankara, the Kárikás of _Gaudapáda_, and the commentaries of _Ānandagiri_ on them, are chiefly devoted to the scrutiny of the sacred syllable, beside the partial disquisition of every other Upanishad and theological work into the hidden sense of this mystic word. Weber points out the Saunaka and Pranava Upanishads among the number (A. S. L., p. 165).

[Sidenote: 7. Mode of our Investigation.]

We shall proceed in this prolegomena first to investigate into the orthographical character and structure of this syllable, and then to inquire into the designations and etymological synonyms or the word, with the lexical meanings that we can get of them, and lastly to treat of the many mystical interpretations which this single word is made to bear as a common emblem of them.

II. ORTHOGRAPHY OF OM.

[Sidenote: 1. The letter ओंकारः]

Firstly: Om with respect, to its name and utterance is called Onkāra, that is, the nasal _On_ in combination with the adjunct kára (signifying a sound) and meaning the letter _On_. For all sounds whether vocal (स्वरवर्ण) or sonant (व्यञ्जन), nasal (सानुनासिक) or not-nasal (निरनुनासिक), articulate (व्यक्तस्फुट) or onomatopoeia (अव्यक्तास्फुट), are denominated letters; as the letters _a_ &c. (अकारादि) are called vowels, the letters Ka &c. (ककारादि) consonants; so the nasals _Ān_, _in_ (आँ ईँ) &c., as also the inarticulate ones (फङ्कार) &c., are all letters; but the Onkāra is the root of all; thus ओंकारेण सर्व्वबाक् सस्तपोति । माण्डुक्योपनिषद् । Manu calls it a letter in the passage:—"This one letter is the emblem of the Most High". II.83. _Vide_ Dr. Mitra's Ch'hánd Up, p. 4.

[Sidenote: 2. A conjunct Letter युक्ताक्षरः]

But here a question is raised as to whether a conjunct vowel or consonant may with propriety be styled a single letter or not. To this says Dr. R. L. Mitra in a foot-note to his translation of the _Ch'hándogya_ Upanishad that—"It is true that this emblem conveys two sounds, that of _O_ and _m_, nevertheless it is held to be one letter in the above sense; and we meet with instances even in the ancient and modern languages of Europe that can justify such privileges, such as _xi_ and _psi_, reckoned single letters in Greek, and Q. W. X. in English and others." (Ch 1. Sec. 1. p. 4). So is _lámálif_ in Persian &c. The Sanskrit conjunct _ksha_ (क्ष) is considered a single consonant, when they say, ककारादि क्षकारान्तं व्यञ्जनं परिकीर्तितं ।

[Sidenote: 3. The Syllable Om ओमक्षरं ]

It is also like every other single or conjoint letter of the alphabet (युक्तायुक्त वर्ण) termed an _akshara_ (अक्षर) or syllable, which forms either a word by itself when standing alone, or part of a word followed by an adjunct as ओं, ओंकार, ओमक्षर &c.; where the first is a word of one syllable or monosyllabic term एकाक्षर, and the others as dissyllabic and trisyllabic words (द्व्यक्षर, त्र्यक्षर शब्द), according as they are uttered by the help of one or more articulations of the voice. _Om_ akshara_ apart from its other signification of the _Imperishable_ and the like, and its symbolism of the Supreme Spirit, is also used in the sense of a syllable in the original writings and their translations. Thus says the _Kathopanishad_ ; एतद्व्येवाक्षरं ब्रह्म एतद्व्येवाक्षरं परं । एतद्व्येवाक्षरं ज्ञात्वा ब्रह्मलोकमहीयते ।

* * * * *

Manu says:—"That which passeth not away is declared to be the syllable om, thence called _akshara_." He calls it also a trilateral monosyllable. II. 84. So says Mon. Wm: "_Om_ is a most sacred monosyllable significant of the Supreme Being." (Indian Wisdom p. 103 note 1).

* * * * *

[Sidenote: 4. The character Om ओंकार ]

_Om_kára_ likewise indicates the written character _Om_, because the suffix _Kára_ like _Ákára_ is used to signify its written form or sign (आकार चिह्न), and in this sense the Bengali ओ, corresponds with Greek character w _omega_ the inverted ओ, or the _Omikron_ = English O, and Oao Persian, and likens to the Sanskrit _bindu_ O, which is but another name of _Om_ (ओंकारः ब्रह्मबिन्दुः). But the ओ is formed by the union of two dots or cyphers (0 bindu) like Greek Omega of two omicrons and the English w of two u's.

So says the Gáyatrí Tantra, ॐकारो ब्रह्म बिन्दुर्बिन्दुद्वयं बिनिर्मितः। अधोर्द्ध बिन्दुरित्यादि। And again: समनुः परमाराध्या संयुक्ता ब्रह्म बिन्दुना. "It is the union of two circlets, one being the symbol of one's own divinity and the other that of Brahma." This character by itself is regarded with high veneration as an emblem of the Infinite, independent of its meaning or utterance, and is marked on the forehead of every devotee in the form of a spot or crescent.

[Sidenote: 5. The Symbol ॐ बिन्दुः।]

The symbolical Om is represented by four cyphers as placed over one another अधोर्द्धबिन्दु चतुष्टयं, and each designated by a different name in the aforesaid Tantra, and supposed to form the cavities of the heart and mouth of Brahm, चतुर्वर्गं प्रदा बिद्या चतुर्बिन्दात्मिकासदा। आद्यन्ते प्रणवदत्वा गायत्रीं प्रजपेदिज। बामाधर्मं प्रदा बिन्दुर्ज्येष्ठा अर्थं प्रदा तथा। रौद्रीकाम प्रदा बिन्दुः श्रीबिन्दुः मोक्षदायिनी॥ महेश्वर बदनं बिन्दुः श्रीविष्णोः हृदयंतथा॥ मोक्षदाताच श्रीबिन्दुः चतुर्बिन्दु बिनिर्णयः॥ These bindus or cyphers are differently named in the Vedánta, as we shall shortly come to see under the denominations of omkára. (No. IV).

[Sidenote: 6. Symbolized as Jagannátha.]

The best representation of Om is the image of the god Jagannátha, which is said to be an incarnation of the mystic syllable प्रणबाबतार, or made in the form of Om, and not in that of Buddha, as some of our antiquarians have erroneously supposed it to be. There is a learned dissertation on the subject of Jagannátha's representation of Onkára to be found in one of the early articles of the Asiatic Society's Researches, where the reader will get much more light on this mysterious subject.

[Sidenote: 7. Comparison of om and on.]

It will further be found on comparison that ॐ bears not only a great resemblance to the Greek on written as o with the nasal above the o, but their perfect agreement with each other in sense will leave no ground of suspecting their identity with one another, as it will be fully treated of afterwards.

III. THE ORTHEOPY OR ANALYSIS OF Om.

[Sidenote: 1. A Monad.]

We have already seen that the circular form of the letter O in Om, called a bindu dot or cypher, was used like a geometrical point to denote a monad without parts, and represent the Supreme Being subsisting as the central point of the great circle of Universe, and filling the infinity of its circumference with his own life and light. The Vedas and the early theology of the Upanishads invariably understood the Om as synonymous with One, and expressive of the unity of the God-head; as in the motto ओमेकमेवाद्वितीयं ब्रह्म। ओमेकामेवैतत्। of the Vedantists, corresponding with the monotheistic creed of Christians and Mahomedans "God is one" and "without an equal" "Wahed Ho la Sharik laho" "The unity of the God-head is the dictum of the Koran and Vedánta." (Mon. Wm's. Hindu Wisd. p. XLI. 1).

The Manduka and similar Upanishads describe the majesty of the one. (Weber, p. 161). "That one breathed breathless by itself" &c. Max Müller's A. S. Lit. p. 560.

Formerly the letter O of om, on, and One was considered a pure and simple sound, and made to represent a monad or Unity; but in course of time and with the progress of language it was found out to be a compound letter (सन्ध्यक्षर), formed by the union of a + u = o (अ + उ = ओ), and two o's in w omega or two u's in w. (See. S. Gr. & Baine's grs). Then the perfect figure of the great circle was considered to be composed of two semicircles which the w = उ was made to represent. This gave rise to the conception of a duality in the divine person, and hence grew the theory of the male and female पुरुष प्रकृति in the original androgyne of the Sankhya and Hara Gauri (हर गौरी and उमा महेश्वर) of the Tantra. Hence it is said; अनित्यक्षरं ब्रह्म शब्द प्रकृति कुण्डली । अनन्यं हि बिना ब्रह्म नास्ति कुत्रापि सुन्दरि । इति गायत्री तन्त्रं ।

The syllable ov = on is a word for Brahma (God), and the other cypher represents nature (the world). There is no Brahma, but ov = ॐ or ओम् । The dualism of Sankhya yoga is too well known to require an explanation.

[Sidenote: 3. Om a Triad.]

At a later period and posterior to the dualistic doctrines of the aforesaid Tantra and Pátanjala yoga systems, the Om branched out into a Triad by the union of the nasal letter m or n with the उ or w, and forming the conjoined character ॐ and wn in Sanskrit and Greek. Henceforward Onkára is regarded as a trilateral word composed of a + u + m to represent a triplicate deity. Thus says Monier Williams:—

“Om is supposed to be composed of three letters A, U, M, which form a most sacred monosyllable (एकाक्षर), significant of the Supreme Being as developing himself in the Triad of gods, Brahmá, Vishnu and Siva” (Indian Wisdom p. 103 note I). So we have in Manu II. 83 and 84:—

अकारञ्चाप्युकारञ्च मकारञ्च प्रजापतिः ।
बेवदत्र्याग्निरुदहत भूभुवः स्वरितीति ॥
अकारो विष्णुरुद्दिष्टः उकारस्तु महेश्वरः ।
मकारउच्यते ब्रह्मा प्रणवेन त्रयोमतः ॥

So also the Bhagavad Gitá. VIII. 13.

Here the two halves of the circle उ comprise Vishnu and Siva as joined in the bipartite body of Hari Hara alias Hara Hari, adored by the dualists called द्वैतवादिनः, or more fully as हरिहराद्वैतवादिनः and Brahmá the god of Manu, is placed in the circlet above the great circle of his created world. We need but hint to our readers in this place, to observe how the original word Om or Ov and One developed itself into the existing faith of trinity. The Tántrica Sivites however place their god Siva in the upper semicirclet formed by म = m the initial of Maheswara (महेश्वर), and say:—

अधोबिन्दु ब्रह्मविष्णुरुद्धविन्दु शिवात्मकं ॥

This is more reasonable to believe from both the letter m's and its god Siva's amalgamation with the early Aryan duality to form the present faith of triality at a much later period.

[Sidenote: 4. Om the Tetrad.]

We next see a further progress of Om in its development from the trilateral to a quadrilateral form, by its assumption of a crescent or half circlet (कुण्डली) according to the Tantra, or a half Mátrá (अर्द्ध मात्रा) of the Vedánta. The Tantra says तदूर्ध्वं कुण्डलीकारा शक्तिः । The Maitrí Upanishad mentions only of the three Mátrás of Om (Ch. vi Sec. 3).

“But the Mundak Upanishad” says Weber, “refers to the half Mátrá (mora), to which the word Om here appearing in its full glory, is entitled in addition to its three Mátrás (morae) a. u. m. This is evidently a later addition by some one who did not like to miss the mention of the subject in the Atharvana Upanishad in which it occurs.” p. 160. Again says he—“The Mándukya Upanishad which treats of the three and half Mátrás of the word Om, is to be looked upon as the real Mándukya, all the rest is the work of the Gaudapáda, whose pupil Govinda was the teacher of Sankarácharya about the seventh century A. D.”

[Sidenote: 5. Om the Pentad.]

We find next a quinquiliteral figure of Om in its component parts of the three mátrás, m, and the bindu or चन्द्र बिन्दु the fifth.

[Sidenote: 6. Om the Hexad.]

And then again with a sextuple or Hexaliteral Om composed of the sixth member of Náda (नाद) over and above the aforesaid five parts.

[Sidenote: 7. Om the Heptad.]

The septuple Om is described in the Ramatápaniya upanishad as consisting of अ, उ, म, नाद, बिन्दु, शक्ति and नमः। Weber's A. S. Lit. p. 312.

[Sidenote: 8. Om the Octad.]

This consists of the aforesaid seven parts, which together with Sánti called in Persian Sákat complete the number, Weber. Id. p. 315.

IV. THE DIFFERENT DENOMINATIONS OF OM.

[Sidenote: 1. The Initial of the Veda.]

The om is denominated the heading of the Veda (बेदशिरः) as the Gáyatrí hymn is termed to be its parent (बेदमाता). It stands at the top (शिरस) of every book (मण्डल), chapter (अष्टक), and hymn (ऋच) of every Veda either alone by itself or two or three oms put together, as ओमग्रामीले on ignem aiede of the Rigveda, ॐ त्रिसप्ता On triseptem &c. of the Atharvan; again ॐ ॐ ॐ ऋग्वेदाय स्वाहा on I salute thee O Rigveda &c.

It is hence used at the head (शिरस) of every book on any branch of knowledge (विद्या) which is a paronym of and derived from the same root (बिद् Video) with Veda (बेद). The Tantra calls it as the heading of the Gáyatrí which begins with the syllable;

तसेतन्महा गुह्यं गायत्र्याः शीर्षमुच्यते ।
ॐ भूर्भुवः स्वः । गायत्रीतन्त्रं ॥

[Sidenote: 2. The sacred Syllable. पूर्णाक्षरं]

It is called the sacred syllable because it is used in sacred writings and in the sacred Vedic and Sanskrit languages only, and never in the popular vernacular tongues, which are known as unsacred and impure (असंस्कृत). Moreover it is used in sacerdotal functions of the sacerdotal class (संस्कारे संस्कृतात्मनां) or regenerate classes of men, and never by the impure Súdra on pain of damnation (ॐकारोच्चारणाद्धोमात् शूद्रो हिनरकं ब्रजेत्), unless he is sacrificed by investiture of the sacred or sacrificial thread, (यज्ञोपवीत). Thus says the Sástra; शूद्रोऽपि अधीकारी स्यात् यज्ञसूत्रप्रदानतः । गायत्री तन्त्रं, ४र्थ पटलः ।

The sacredness of the word Om, as the expression for the eternal position of things, is specially emphasised in the Katha Upanishad (Weber. p. 158).

[Sidenote: 3. The Holy syllable पवित्रं]

It is held as the most holy syllable being an appellation of the Most High, and must not be uttered in unholiness even by the holy orders of men: so says the Katha Up;—"This is the most holy syllable, this the supreme syllable, whosoever knoweth this syllable getteth whatever he desireth." (Cowell's Maitrí Upanishad. Ch. VI. S. 4) note.

[Sidenote: 4. The Mystic Syllable गुह्यं]

This is styled the mystic syllable because the most recondite and abstruse doctrines of Brahmanical theism are hidden under its symbolical garb, and form the foundation of those wonderful structures of the mystic poetry and philosophy of nations, which have been beautifully illustrated by Sir W. Jones in his "Mystic Poetry of the Hindus, Persians, and Greeks." It was this mysticism which invited a Pythagoras of old to India. Manu says;—"He knows the Veda, who distinctly knows the mystic sense of this word." Chap XI. 266.

These senses are recommended to be deeply studied by the Upanishads themselves, saying;—"The _om_ is a subject of deep study" (Web. p. 163), and forms of itself "as another triple Veda." (Manu XI. 265). It is enjoined to be carefully kept in secrecy by the Tantras and Smritis.

तत्त्वमेतन्महा गुह्यं गायत्र्याः कुक्षिरुच्यते ।
तदेन्महामन्त्रं गोप्यं गोप्यं हि यत्नतः ॥

[Sidenote: 5. The Mysterious syllable गूढाक्षर]

_Om_ again as a symbol of the eternal position of things प्रकृतिः कुण्डालाकारा, presents to us a mysterious round of the mystic dance of myriads of spheres, emitting an inaudible sound reaching beyond its utmost limit to the unknown One who sitteth above the circumference of its visible horizon; or as the sacred writer expresses it; "He that sitteth on the circle of the earth." Isaiah. Chap. X. 1. The Tantra speaks of its encompassing the world; व्यापकत्वादि तत्त्वाच्च बिन्दुस्तेनैव कथ्यते, अनुस्वारस्वरूपासा बिन्दुरुपाधिदाकृतिः । गायत्रीतन्त्रं ।

That _om_ contains within it the whole sphere of sounds (नाद) is beautifully illustrated in twenty slokas or stanzas in an Upanishad of that name the नादबिन्दूपनिषद् । (Weber, p. 165). It shows how the eternal sound _om_ emitted by _Brahma_ pervaded throughout the Universe, and the manner in which all other sounds are propelled by continual vibrations of air like curves upon the surface of water (वीचितरङ्गन्यायेन) to the auditory of the other. The _Vindu_ is a _Mudrá_ in Tantra व्यापकत्वाद्विन्दुमुक्तं । कुण्डलिनी स्वार सर्व्व व्यापिनी । Compare the Pythagorean music of the spheres.

[Sidenote: 7. The Focus of light तेजो बिन्दुः]

The _Tejovindu Upanishad_ describes _Om_ as the source and focus of light in fourteen slokas, and the empyrean above it as the abode of pure ineffable light (परं ज्योतिः) of God that illumines the other spheres. (Web. p. 165). This light is viewed in the orb of the sun and in fire by their worshippers. Compare Milton's hymn to light; "Hail holy light" &c.

[Sidenote: 8. The spot of immortality अमृत बिन्दुः]

Again _Om_ is termed the reservoir of immortality or endless life in the Amritavindu Upanishad which describes it in thirty stanzas, to be the eternal fountain of the infinity of lives that fills all animated nature, and is drawn back to it. Its circumference extends to the regions of light and life, and beyond it is the region of death and darkness. "In this word there is light and life" (John 1) ॐज्योतिश्च प्राणश्च । इति तत्र ६ । ४ see Weber's A. S. Lit. pp. 69, 154, 165.

Therefore _Om_ is called the centre of meditation in the _Dhyānavindu Upanishad_ of twenty one stanzas, which direct the concentration of our thoughts to that centre for the attainment of perpetual light and life which flow from it. (Weber p. 165). The Tantra takes a चक्र or मुद्रा and the Buddhist a chink in the wall to fix the sight in meditation.

[Sidenote: 10. The Position of Brahma ब्रह्म बिन्दुः]

And lastly _Om_ is styled the receptacle of the great God, whose essence fills, pervades, and encompasses the whole orbit of the Universe, as it is described in twenty two slokas of the Brahma Vindu-Upanishad. It is called Brahma Mudrá in the Tantra. (Weber, p. p. 99, 158, 165).

V. ETYMOLOGY OF THE WORD _Om_.

[Sidenote: 1. Etymology of the _Om_. ॐ शब्द]

Having thus far seen the mysterious nature of the letter and syllable _Om_ in its Orthography, we shall now consider it as a word, and see that not a less but much greater mystery is attached to its etymology than has been hitherto thought of by any, and which will be found upon examination to be more inscrutable in its nature than the mysteries of Eleusis and the inexplicable hieroglyphics of the Egyptian priests.

[Sidenote: 2. Its symbolism of Brahmanism तद्ब्रह्मण्यम्]

These secret and sacred treasures of Brahmanic enigmas and symbols, have been carefully preserved by the Brahmahood in their cabalistic writings of the Tantras, which serve to be a secure safeguard of their religion amidst the ravages of foreigners in their liberty and literature, and require to be diligently searched into for a thorough mastery of these mysticisms.

[Sidenote: 3. Its derivation तदुत्पत्तिः]

_Om_ is denominated a word (शब्द) in the Veda and other sacred scriptures, and explained as a noun also (संज्ञा) in the Nirukta and other lexicons. It is derived in the Koshas from the root _aba_ or _ava_ to protect, or save (रक्षणे) with the _Unadi_ suffix मन् an anomalous formation into _om_ to denote "protection." Dr. Mitra too derives it from the radical अब् "to preserve" with the suffix मन to denote the Most High according to Manu and Gítá. (Translation of Ch'hándogya Up. p. 4).

[Sidenote: 4. Its Primary sense धात्वर्थः]

Apart from the symbolical significations of _Om_ (of which there are several as we shall come to notice afterwards), its primary and literal sense would make us give different interpretations of it according to the derivation of the term both in its verbal and nominal forms. अब् as a verb in the imperative mood means "save" as मातरब्, त्रातरब्, दबऽब &c. in the _Mugdhabodha_, corresponding with the expressions, _Ave Maria_, salve salvator, salve Deus, save O God &c.

[Sidenote: 5. Its Nominal sense व्युत्पत्त्यर्थः]

But _aba_ to protect or preserve gives us the nominal (कृदन्त) forms of aba, ába, ábu, and ábuka (अब, आब, आबु, आबुक), meaning a father or preserver in the Prákrit Speech of Sanskrit dramas, and these are found to agree in both respects of sound and sense with the words _áb_, _ábá_, _ábu_, _ábuka_, _abi_ as _ábuka_ &c. in Hebrew, Chaldee, Syriac and Arabic languages. This gives us the original meaning of अब् of which ॐ is a derivative form, and shows the close affinity which the Aryan root bears to the Semitic, both in its sound and signification of "Father" (पाता and पिता) applied to the Great God.

[Sidenote: 6. The word Om ॐ शब्दः]

But our question being _Om_ and not the root अब्, we ought to know to what part of speech it belongs and what sense we are to give of it here. It is said to be a word indicative of auspiciousness when used at the beginning; (आदौ ॐ शब्द प्रयोगो माङ्गलिकः). But whether as a verb or noun or any other part of speech, we know nothing of, and we are utterly at a loss what word to substitute for it in its translation. This is the reason why the word _Om_, is used by itself in the translations of Sanskrit works by Europeans and our countrymen also for want of a proper term, as it is seen in the English versions of Vedas and Upanishads.

[Sidenote: 7. An aptot noun अव्यय शब्दः ।]

_Om_ is enlisted as an indeclinable word in grammar having no inflection of its own in gender, number, case or person, and agreeing with all words in its unchanged state, as in the examples:- ओमीश्वर, ॐ दुर्गा, ॐ ब्रह्मन्, ॐ देवेभ्यो जुहोमि, ओमुपेत्वा ऊर्जेत्वा &c. It is included in the (स्वरादिगण) as an aptot noun, and with indeclinable particles (निपातन), as an adverb, conjunction and interjection also with various significations.

[Sidenote: 8. The initial _Om_ आद्योमार्थः ।]

The anomalous and multonymous particle _Om_ was first discovered by Ram Mohun Roy to be no other than the participial noun _on_ = _being_ which as Max Müller says is _to on_ on tws_ the Being of Beings A. S. Lit. pp. 321 _et passim_. The Latin _ens_ and the French _on_ as _t'on_, bear close affinity to On and ॐ both in their sound and sense.

[Sidenote: 9. The Final _Om_ अन्त्योमार्थः ।]

Dr. Rájendra Lála Mitra has in one of his works pointed out the Vedic _Om_, to correspond with the Hebrew "Amen," and this will be found so true of the final _Om_ of Brahmanical prayers, that its corresponding word _Amin_ invariably forms the last word of every prayer in Arabic, Persian and all other Mahomedan and Semitic languages. Thus it is to be seen how intimately are both of these grand families of mankind connected with each other in the main point of their different creeds.

VI. LEXICAL MEANINGS OF _Om_.

[Sidenote: Adverbial Meanings. अभिधानिक निपातनार्थः ।]

After the etymological and philological interpretations that we have been given of the word _Om_, it is worthwhile to attend to its meanings given in the current lexicons for the information of the majority, with whom the evidence of the history of philology is of little weight and value. Táránáth's Sanskrit dictionary (वाचस्पत्याभिधान) presents us with following adverbial meanings of the word.

[Sidenote: 1. An Inceptive Particle. आरम्भार्थकः ।]

The Medinikosha says he, expounds it as an inchoative particle (आरम्भार्थक शब्द) to mean the beginning of a thing (उपक्रम), and we find it accordingly used in the form of a proemial monogram at the exordium of a book or Vedic hymn, sacred rite or lecture, in the Sanhitas, Bráhmanas and Upanishads according to the passage quoted by Táránátha in his dictionary; तस्मादोमित्युदाहृत्य कृता बेदवादिनाम । यज्ञाद्याक्रिया शास्त्रोक्ताः सततं सम्प्रवर्तिन्ते ॥ It answers the अथ of the Purána and the words _now_ and _then_ in English as in the passage of the Kathavalli; ॐ उशन् हवे बाजश्रवस इत्यादि ।

It is synonymous with beginning (आदि) in the Ch'hándogya Upanishad, whereupon the poet has well said. आसीत् महीक्षितामाद्यः प्रणवश्छन्दसा मिब । रघुवंशः । १ सर्गः ।

[Sidenote: 2. Illustrations of Ditto तदुदाहरणानि ।]

Krishna (under the conception of the identity of his soul with that of the Divine), speaks of himself in the Bhágavadgítá that, he was the letter _a_ of the alphabet, and the _Om_ of words (वर्णानामकारोऽहं शब्दानाञ्चोङ्कारः). This is shown in the latest English translation of the work to be a doctrine derived from Christianity and corresponds with the passage "I am Alpha &c." in the book of Revelations (Ch. I. V. 8). There is a similar passage in the Koran which says "He (God) is the first; _Ho al awl_ corresponding with the Greek" _Ho esten arche_; and this passage and sometimes its initial O (Gr.) and our ॐ, is used by Moslems at the top and commencement of their books and other writings. Again like _Alpha_ of the holy Scripture we find the use of Alif upon the head of all writings in Urdu, Persian, Arabic and Hebrew in daily practice.

Hence it is hard to say who is the borrower, though every one will boast itself to be the lender. (_Vide_ Weber's paper on the Rám Tap Up.
pp. 276, and 360).

[Sidenote: 3. An Initiatory Particle मङ्गलार्थः ]]

The Kosha adds the sense of auspiciousness and prosperity (मङ्गलेशुभे) to the above, and this as we have already observed forms like the names of gods, the initiatory vocable of meritorious undertakings (आदाबोम शब्दः माङ्गलिकः). "Om" says the Ch'hándogya, "is also prosperity" (I, 8.) To this the scholiast Sankara says; "the letter _Om_ is called prosperity, because it is possessed of the property and attribute of prosperity. The prosperous alone can pass the word _Om_" (Chh. up. Ch. 1, p. 8).

Its use is not confined to the sacred and antiquated language of Vedic writing and the liturgy, but is to be met with in the classic Sanskrit of ancient bards and modern poets. Thus we have in the Rámáyana of our author (रामायण ५।८१।११। प्राज्यस्वर्विजयोङ्कारश्चक्रे). In this sense we discover a curious affinity of the Aryan _Om_ with the Semitic _Áman_ _Amán_ and _Aiman_, as in the Persian phrase _Aiman buád_ corresponding with ॐ or शुभं भूयात्।

[Sidenote: 4. Gratulatory, Particle नमस्कारार्थः ]]

The word has been rendered in our translation by the salutatory term "Hail", from a supposed similarity of its meaning with that of _namo_ नमस् which is used by women and Súdras in lieu of the sacred _Om_ in their salutations to gods and superior beings, owing to the denunciation pronounced upon their utterance of the sacred syllable (स्त्रीशूद्रयोः प्रणवं नेच्छन्ति). We find its use in the same sense in Dr.
Roer's Translation of the Aitareya Upanishad, where it is rendered by "salutation to the Supreme Soul" and by "adoration" in Cowell's version of the Maitrí Upanishad. We are however at a loss of authority to warrant our adoption of _namo_ as a synonym of _Om_. We meet with instances of the use of _Om_ and _namo_ together to mean salutation, as, ॐन्नमः शिवाय and शिवायोंन्नमः in the Mugdhabodha, where _namo_, expresses obeisance and governs शिवाय in the dative, and not _Om_ which has no governing power.

[Sidenote: 5. Invocatory particle सम्बोधनार्थः ]]

_Om_ in the sense of invocation is an absolute monoptot like भो, भगो, अघो, अहो &c., without the power of governing the following word, as ॐ नारायणा, and its double use as ॐ हरिः ॐ in the Aitareya Upanishad (1); so भो रक्ष, भगोरक्ष in the Mugdhabodha; but नमो and its synonyms स्वाहा, स्वाघा, बषट्, श्रौषट् govern the dative as नमो हरये, स्वाहाग्रये, स्वघा पित्रे, &c. The invocatory _Om_ is synonymous with the interjections O, ओ, अहो, हो and all other single vowels whether nasal or not (सानुनासिकनिरणुनासिकाः), all of which are ungoverning particles in this sense.

[Sidenote: 6. A Laudatory particle प्रणवः ]]

_Om_ is usually termed as _pranava_ प्रणवः or praise or word of praise, from the root _nu_ (प्र+नु+अप्) to laud, and in this sense it might mean the glorification of Te Deum. Thus "Om" is the _pranava_ or initial word of the Rigveda priests, and it is termed the Udgítha (उद्गीथः) of Sāma Veda choristers सामगा who chaunt it". (छन्दोग्यउपनिषद् १।३).
But it is made to signify the object of the verb, or the Being that is lauded (यनौति); and in this sense it means, "The Purusha or spirit who is unaffected by works, affections &c., and having the appellation of Pranava" (see Monier Williams' Wisdom of the Hindus p. 103), so says Gaudapáda in his Káriká. In the former sense, Pranava corresponds with _halleluyas_ and _hosannas_ of Christians, and _hamd o Salaut_ of Moslems, which are deemed sacred by their votaries. The Káriká has the following stanzas on it:—प्रणवोद्धारं ब्रह्म प्रणवश्च परः स्मृतः । प्रणवं हीश्वरं विद्यात् सर्वस्य हृदि संस्थितः ॥

युञ्जीतप्रणवे चेतः प्रणवे ब्रह्मनिर्भयं । प्रणवे नित्ययुक्तस्यनभयं बिद्यते कचित् ॥

[Sidenote: 7. A Permissive Particle अनुमत्यर्थः ।]

It is used in a permissive sense both in Vedic and classic Sanskrit, and expressed in English by the words "on" "go on" and the like. We have an instance of it in the Māgha Kāvya, in the passage:

ओमित्युक्तबतोथशार्ङ्गिनः इतिव्याहृत्यबाचनंमः ।

[Sidenote: (_a_) An Injunctive अनुज्ञार्थः ।]

"Verily this is an injunctive term (अनुज्ञाक्षरं),signifying injunction, order, and whatever is enjoined, and ultimately the letter _Om_. (Ch'hándogya Upanishad). The scholium (भाष्य)explains it by saying that, "Whatever is enjoined by the learned or wealthy regarding learning and wealth, it is done by saying "Om"." (Ibid I. 8. p. 8.)

[Sidenote: 8. A Particle of assent अङ्गीकारः ।]

It bears also the sense of assent and consent (अङ्गीकारश्चीकारौ) meaning "ay" "aye" "yea" and "yes", and in Bengali and Vernaculars हैं and हुँ. So says Sankarāchārya:—"Whatever is assented to by the learned and wealthy, it is done by saying "_Om_". Thus in the Vedic tradition; Yājñavalkya having been asked by Sākalya as to how many gods there were, said; "Thirty-three." Sākalya assented by saying "Om." Among modern writings, the Sāhitya Darpana cites the following instance of _Om_ being used in this sense:—भ्रातद्विरफ भवता भ्रमता समन्तात् ।

प्राणाधिका प्रियतमा ममबीक्षिता किं । ब्रूतेकिमोमित्यादि ।

[Sidenote: 9. A Particle of Repulse. अपाकृतिः ।]

It is used as the interjectional particle हुँकार expressive of repelling or driving off another from one like "Avaunt" in English. We meet with an instance of its use in this sense in the Vetāla Panchavinsati of Lassen (VI.) Thus, कृतोङ्कार बेतालेत्यादि ।

[Sidenote: 10. Do. of Ratifying. दृढीकरणे ।]

It occurs in the sense of confirmation at the end of hymns and prayers in the Vedic writings, and corresponds with the words "Amen" and "Amin" at the conclusion of Christian and Moslem sermons and prayers as we have said long before. We have a verse of Hafiz to this effect, where he says _bishnow O Āmin bogo_ i. e. "Hear and say amen." There are many instances of it in the Upanishads, such as शान्तिः शान्तिः शान्तिः ओं हरिः ओं, and so in the Gáyatrī hymn which begins and ends with _Om_, agreeably to the precept which says; आद्यन्ते प्रणवं दत्त्वा गायत्रीं प्रजपेद्भुविजः । चतुर्बर्गं प्रदा बिद्या चतुर्विद्यात्मिका सदा । गायत्री तन्त्रं ।

VII. THE NOMINAL MEANINGS OF _Om_.

[Sidenote: 1. Nominal Meanings of _Om_. संज्ञार्थः ।]

Besides the meanings already given of _Om_ as a particle, there are many other nominal significations attached to it as a significant noun or rather symbol to express certain attributes belonging to the nature of the Deity, that bear little or no connection with the etymology of the word.

[Sidenote: 2. _Om_ the Creator जगत् स्रष्टा ।]

_Om_ is used to denote the creative power of God in Sankara's scholium. This sense is had from the primordial word _logos_ the ov = _be_ or _fiat_ भूयात् _buad_ uttered by God in his creation of the world, as we have in the scripture. "And god said, "Let there be" and there was". Latin _Fiat-et-fit_ ; and Arabic _Kom fa Kána_.

[Sidenote: 3. Om is _God_ ईश्वरः भिधानं ।]

Pátanjala takes it as denotative of God himself तस्येश्वर वाचकतेति पातञ्जलः; and others as a denotation of the Supreme God ॐ परमेश्वरेच । एतद्व्येवाक्षरं
परं । इति कठः । तारानाथ वाचस्पत्याभिधानं ।

[Sidenote: 4. Om is Brahma. ब्रह्म ।]

_Om_ is the verbal symbol of Brahma signifying the Universal spirit ॐ ब्रह्मणि च । ब्रह्मणः नामविशेषः तारानाथः so says the Katha Upanishad एतद्व्येवाक्षरं ब्रह्म । This meaning is obtained from ॐ = om signifying _being_ or existence, and referring to the totality of existence expressed by the word Brahma (formed of बृह + मन) _universal pervasion_.

[Sidenote: 5. Greatness of Brahma ब्रह्मत्वं बृहत्त्वञ्च ।]

Om is used also to denote the vast magnitude of Brahma (ब्रह्मत्वं बाबृहत्वं) in the Maitrí Upanishad, which says "_Om_ is the greatness of Brahman, says one who continually meditates thereon." (See Cowell's Translation of Id. IV. 4. p. 253). This idea is naturally suggested by the infinity of the Universe pervaded and encompassed by the spirit of God. सर्व्वं बिन्दु गतं हैतत् ब्रह्माण्डञ्चापिकोटिशः । गायत्री तन्त्रं । The Ch'hándogya Upanishad speaks of the greatness and effects of _Om_ (I. 9). To this the scholium raises the question, what are its greatness and effects? Then answers it by saying;—"by the greatness of _Om_ is implied the existence of priests, the institutions of sacrifices &c. &c. Therefore is its greatness."

[Sidenote: 6. Om is the way to Brahma ब्रह्मज्ञानोपायः ।]

"_Om_," says the Mándukya Upanishad, "is the means (symbol) leading to Brahma," as a hieroglyphic character to its significate. Here says the commentator Ānandagiri (p.336.) ओङ्कारो ब्रह्म वृद्धोपास्य मानो ब्रह्म प्रतिपत्युपायो भवतीति । आनन्दगिरि टीका । "It is known in all the Vedántas as the best means towards the accomplishment of one's adoration." (Ch'hándogya Upanishad p. 5 note.)

[Sidenote: 7. Immutable & Imperishable ॐ अक्षरः ।]

It is immutable, undecayable, imperishable, indestructible and immortal (अक्षरं). Thus in the Mándukya; ओमित्येतदक्षरमिदं बिकार रहितमित्यादि । The circle of O is considered the most perfect of all geometrical figures, as it was held by the Pythagoreans to be the best symbol to represent the perfections of the Supreme Being. It is the sign of divine immutability from the fact of every other figure changing its shape by its constant rotation round the centre and becoming a spheroid which is no more susceptible of change. Such is the changeable nature of all things until they become one with the Divinity.

[Sidenote: Om Knowable. ज्ञेयं ।]

_Om_ the symbol of God is said to be the knowable, because every part of its circumference is equidistant from the central observer. So is God said to be knowable (ज्ञेय) in Yoga philosophy for his knowableness to every one by means of meditation. Hence the Yoga system is called gnosticism contrary to the unknowableness of agnosticism.

[Sidenote: 8. Eternity नित्यं ।]

_Om_ is called eternal (नित्यं), because its circular form is the representation of eternity, having neither its beginning nor end (अनाद्यनन्तः) so it is the symbol of infinity, the circle being described by an infinite line. Thus Gaudapáda; अपूर्व्वोऽनन्तरोऽनन्तः नपरः प्रणवाब्ज्य । इति माण्डुक्य कारिकायां । १६ ।

[Sidenote: 9. The First and Last.]

Again Om is said to be the first and last of all things, because, says Táránátha, every thing proceeds from its centre as its source, and returns to that centre as its reservoir. तस्मान्निःसृताः सर्व्वे प्रलीयन्त तत्रैव । वाचस्पत्याभिधानं; or that every thing like the line of the circle meets at the same point from where it is drawn and stretched. Moreover Om as has been 189999 already said, is used both as the initial and final word of Mantras and 190000 prayers, so it is understood to be the beginning and end of all motions 190001 and utterances. In these senses it answers the Alpha and Omega of 190002 the Revelation, and the initium and finem—Hoal awl Hoal ákher of 190003 the Koran.

190005 [Sidenote: 10. The First, Last and Midst. आद्यन्त मध्यं ]
190006

190007 But Om is declared again to be the first, last and midst of things,
190008 from its being uttered in the beginning, middle and end of prayers
190009 and recitals of sacred hymns according to the ordinance which says
190010 that, Om is to be repeated thrice at every recital in the beginning,
190011 middle and end:—प्रशस्तं ब्राह्मणे नित्यं प्रणवत्रय संयुतं । मध्येच प्रणवं गुप्तं चाकारानुमं
190012 प्रिये । इति गायत्री तन्त्रं । This rule is said to bear reference 190013 to the triple state of the progression of mortal beings,—their 190014 evolution, sustentation and dissolution. यतो बाइमानि भूतानि जायन्ते येन
190015 जातानि । जीवन्ति यत् प्रयन्त्यभिसम्बिधन्ति तद्ब्रह्मेति ॥ The triple utterance of Om has given 190016 rise to the triplicate invocation of Hari, आदाबन्तेच मध्येच हरिः सर्वत्र गीयते,
190017 and with what Milton has expressed in his glorious hymn in the Paradise
190018 Lost.

190019
190020 "Him first, Him last, Him midst, and without end."
190021

190022 The reverend Gaudapáda enjoins the same ordinance in his versified
190023 commentary or Káriká to the Mándukya Upanishad, where he says (verse 190024 27) :—सर्वस्य प्रणवो ह्यादिर्मध्यमान्तस्तथैवच । एवं हि प्रणवं ज्ञात्वा व्यश्नुते तदनन्तरं ।

190026 190027 VIII. APPLICATION OF Om 190028 IN THE VEDAS AND VEDANTA. 190029

190030 [Sidenote: 1. Pranava = Adorable.]
190031

190032 "O venerable, let me enter thee (viz. the word Om)—the sheath of 190033 Brahmá, swáhá. O venerable do thou enter me, swáhá. O venerable, I 190034 shall be purified by thee." (Taittiríya Up. IV. 3).
190035

190036 [Sidenote: 2. The Burden of song.]
190037

190038 "Om, the hymns of the Sáma Sing, Om, Som, the hymns proclaim."
190039

190040 [Sidenote: 3. Commanding and assenting.]
190041

190042 "By Om, the Adhwarju gives his reply:—By Om the Brahmá commands;—By Om 190043 he gives his orders for the burnt offering" (Ibid VIII. Anuvák).

190045 [Sidenote: 4. Beginning.]
190046

190047 "Om, says the Bráhma, when he commences to read the Veda." (Ibid).
190048

190049 [Sidenote: 5. Om is Multinymous.]
190050

190051 "Om is Brahman, it is immortal, it is light, it is truthful, and a 190052 portion of holy light."
190053

190054 "It is the sun, the truthful, the Yajur, devotion, fire, wind and air."
190055

190056 "It is the moon, strength, immortality, and the means of attaining 190057 Brahma" (Maitrí Upanishad VI. 35.) ॐ ब्रह्म अमृतं ज्योतिस्तेज सोऽहंश मात्रं ।
190058 आदित्य मध्ये उदुत्वा मयूखे भवतः । ॐकारानुज्ञापणात् ॥ एतत् सवित् सत्यधर्म एतद्यजुरेतत्तयः एतदग्निरेतद्वायुरेतदापः ।
190059 एतच्चन्द्रमा एतच्छुक्रमेतदमृतमेतद्ब्रह्म विषयं ॥
190060

190061 [Sidenote: 6. It is all significant.]
190062

190063 But apart from all the particular objects to which this word is 190064 severally applied, Om is found from its general sense of "a being"
190065 at large, to be significant of "all things," as its archetype Brahman 190066 is made to stand for universal existence both collectively as well as 190067 singly (in toto et per singulatim), as it is said in the Mándukya

Upanishad, ओमित्येतदक्षरमिदं सर्वं तस्योपव्याख्यानं भूतं भविष्यदिति सर्वमोङ्कार एव,
यच्चान्यत् त्रिकालातीतं तदप्योङ्कार एव ॥

[Sidenote: 7. Om includes all things.]

“Om” says the Sruti, “is immortal.” Its explanation is “this all”; what was, what is, and what will be, all is verily the word “Om”; and every thing else which is beyond the three-fold time is also verily the word “Om.” For this all (represented by “Om”) is Brahma, and Brahma is “all.” (Māndukya Upanishad Bhāshya verse 1 and 2). ओमिति ब्रह्मएवेदमोङ्कारः सर्वमित्यादिश्रुतिभ्यः । अभिधानस्यचोङ्कारव्यतिरेकादोङ्कार एवेदं सर्वं ।

According to Sankara’s explanation the rendering would be as follows:—“Om” this sound (or immortal) is this “All,” and its explanation is “what was, what is, and will be, all is verily the word “Om”.” (Sankara’s Bhāshya of the above). Ānandagiri’s explanation is to the same purport; thus says he:—

सर्वस्पर्शदत्तादोङ्कारस्य ब्रह्मणश्च तथात्वादेक लक्षणत्वादप्यत्वासिद्धेरोङ्कार प्रतिपत्ति ब्रह्म प्रतिपत्तिरेवेति ॥

IX. THEOLOGY OF OM IN THE MONADS OF MONOTHEISTIC CREEDS.

[Sidenote: 1. Monads or Unities. एकार्थकः ।]

We have seen that _Om_ expresses all things (Sarvamonkāra), by virtue of the word like its kindred Greek and Latin _on_ and _ens_ (B. _haon_), signifying “a being” by synecdoche (_laxaná_) of a part for the whole. And this is done of all things whether concrete or discrete and taken either singly or by groups of two or more things together; as it is said—“_Ekasadvīśastrīśas_” &c., i. e. _Singulatim_, _dualiter_, _pluraliter_ &c. We shall first come to see the monads expressed by _Om_ and leave it to the reader to discover the relation which the significates may bear to the symbol, or rest satisfied with the idea of their being meaningless or arbitrary.

[Sidenote: 2. Om is speech or voice वाक् ।]

Om, says the Sruti is Sarvāvāk “all voice and speech”; and we shall come to see below that it is applied alike to denote both human and brute speech, and words belonging to all the different parts of speech.

[Sidenote: 3. Om is sound and word शब्द ।]

“All things are united with words which express them, and all words are contained in the mystical syllable _Om_, (ओङ्कार शब्द म ।त्रे). _Om_, pervades all sounds; he rises above all objects which are expressed by sounds, who repeats this sound _Om_” (Ch’hāndogya II.23.) (Maitrī p. 253).

[Sidenote: 4. Om is Brahman ॐ शब्द ब्रह्म ।]

“_Om_ is Brahman called sound (_sabda_). By means of _Om_ rising above all things, a man merges in the Supreme called Para Brahma.” “Om is the emblem of the Most High.” (Ch’hāndogya p. 4. Manu II. 83. Bhāgavad Gītā). So says the Maitrī Upanishad (VI. 22) शब्द ब्रह्मणि निष्णातः परं ब्रह्माधिगच्छति । ६ ।१२

[Sidenote: 5. Om is Fire and its splendour ओमग्निश्च तेजश्च ।]

“Om was splendour and fire at first. By this syllable _Om_ the splendour germinates, it shoots upward, it expands, and becomes the vehicle of divine worship. The splendour germinates in the form of the mystic syllable _Om_, as a seed germinates; i. e. It is manifested as the primeval form of the Veda, it next shoots upward as the internal sound _Om_ itself.” Maitrī Up. VII. 11. तेजो प्रथममोङ्कारात्मकमासीत् । तत्तेजोऽनैनैवोमित्येव तदुदबुध्यति । मैत्री उप० ७ ।११ । Fire was the first object of adoration of the Rigveda and of the fire worshippers of India and Persia. It is

190138 Heraclitus.
190139
190140 [Sidenote: 6. Om is light. ॐ ज्योतिः ।]
190141
190142 "Om is light and manifest as light, the sleepless, deathless and 190143 sorrowless light." Again; "Om is light which shines in yonder sun, 190144 and in the moon, fire, and lightning" (Maitrī Upanishad VI. 25.). So 190145 says the Bhāgavad Gītā, "That splendour which abiding in the sun 190146 illumines the whole world, which abides in the moon and in fire, that 190147 splendour know to be mine" (XV. 12.) Light was the first work of 190148 creation and the "first born" of Heaven. God said "_Lux fiat et lux 190149 fit_."—"Let there be light and there was light."
190150
190151 दीप्यतोम् ज्योतिः । प्रकाशणाज्योतिः । प्रणवाख्य प्रणेतारमरूपो बिगतनिद्रो बिजरो बिमल्युर्बिशोको भवतीत्येवं ह्याह । मैत्री उप

190154 [Sidenote: 7. _Om_ is Lightning. बिद्युज्योतिः ।]
190155
190156 "The Veda is called lightning, since the moment when it is uttered (as 190157 Om), it enlightens every incorporated being; therefore by the syllable 190158 _Om_ let a man adore the infinite splendour of Brahman" (Maitrī 190159 Upanishad VII. 11.) यस्मादुच्चरितमात्र एव सर्वं शरीरं बिद्योतयति ।
190160 तस्मादोमित्यनेनैता उपासीतापरिमितं तेजः । मैत्री उप ७ । ११ ।
190161
190162 [Sidenote: 8. Om is the Brahman light. ॐ ब्रह्म ज्योति ।]
190163
190164 "The syllable _Om_ is the Brahman light or pure intelligence, veiled 190165 behind the fire and breath, and manifested itself at first as the 190166 one undivided sound _Om_." Thus the Maitrī Upanishad Tīkā (VII. 11).
190167 यस्मात् प्रणवात्मकमिदं ब्रह्मासीत् तस्मादोमित्यनेनैतत् ब्रह्म तेजो उपासीत् । मैत्री ७ । ११ ।
190168
190169 [Sidenote: 9. _Om_ is Water. ओमापः ।]
190170
190171 "Om shines in the waters" (Maitrī Upanishad VI. 35). आपो ज्योतिरसोऽमृतं
190172 ब्रह्मभूर्भुवःस्वरोम् । मैत्री ६ । १३५ । दीप्यतोमापः । ओङ्कारोऽनुज्ञापनादाप्यायनादापः । इति तट्टीका । Water is said
190173 to be the first work of God (आप एवमसजादौ ।) "and the Spirit of God 190174 floated on the surface of the waters" hence called नारायणः (Genesis 190175 and Manu). Thales found water to be the origin of all things.
190176
190177 [Sidenote: 10. _Om_ is Flavour &c. रसोबैतत् ।]
190178
190179 "Om is _Rasa_, moisture, flavour, taste, relish and love (Maitrī Up.
190180 VI. 35). The goodness of God is flavour, a man having attained flavour, 190181 becomes possessed of joy" (Taittirīya Up II. 7.) ॐ रसोबैतत् । रसः कर्म
190182 परिपाक निवृत्तत्वात् आदित्यस्य रसतः सर्वं कर्म फलाश्रय इत्यर्थः । By flavour _rasa_ they mean 190183 love also and love is believed to be the formative power according to 190184 Empedocles.
190185
190186 [Sidenote: 11. Om is Ambrosia. ओममृतं मधु ।]
190187
190188 "_Om_ is ambrosia the food of gods. (Gr. _He ambrosia est setos 190189 theon_). It is also honey and all sweet." So the Sruti;
190190 अमृतं देवानामोदन हेतुत्वात् । मैत्री उप ६ । १३५ । असौबामधु । छान्दोग्यं तैत्तिरीयञ्च । १ । ७ ।
190191
190192 [Sidenote: 12. Om Udgītha. ओमुद्गीथः ।]
190193
190194 "_Om_, this letter the Udgītha, should be adored, Om is chaunted."
190195 (Ch'hāndogya I. 1).
190196
190197 "The Udgītha of Sāma Veda, corresponds with the _pranava_ of the Rig 190198 Veda." (Cowel's Mait VI. 3).
190199
190200 "The Udgītha is the principle part of the Sāma verse, and sung by 190201 Udgātri priests."
190202
190203 "It is chaunted (Udgīyate), and is therefore called Udgītha and is a 190204 _Karmāngāvayava_ or part of the liturgy."
190205

190206 "What is Udgítha, that is Om; what is Om, that is Udgítha." (Maitrí.
190207 Ch'chándogya).
190208
190209 [Sidenote: 13. _Om_ is breath. ॐ स्वासः ।]
190210
190211 "Om called the Udgítha is breath," (Ch'hándogya Upanishad p. 12).
190212
190213 [Sidenote: 14. _Om_ is sun. आदित्य ।]
190214
190215 "The sun is _Om_, _Om_ is Udgítha, the sun is Udgítha, he is _Om_."
190216 (Maitrí IV. 4).
190218 "The splendour of Brahman is yonder sun, and it too is the splendour of 190219 Om." (Ibid). यद्ब्रह्म ज्योतिः यज्ज्योतिः स आदित्यः । यत् सबितुतदादित्यः । मैत्री उप ।
190220
190221 [Sidenote: 15. Om the soul. ओमात्मेति ।]
190222
190223 "The soul is looked upon as _Om_." (Ch'hándogya Upanishad. p. 12). "For 190224 this all represented by _Om_ is Brahma. This soul is Brahma." (Mándukya 190225 V. 2). ॐकार एव आत्म स्वरूपमेव । तस्यैतस्य परापर ब्रह्मरूपस्याक्षरस्योपब्याख्यानं ।
190226
190227 [Sidenote: 16. Om the Supreme spirit. ॐ परमात्मा ।]
190228
190229 "_Om_ is the most appropriate name for the Supreme Spirit
190230 _paramátman_." (Ch'hándogya I. 1). "The Universal soul is the totality 190231 of individual souls." (समष्टि ब्यष्टि).
190232
190233 [Sidenote: 17. Om is Mind. ॐ मनस् ।]
190234
190235 "Om is mind _manas_, the self consciousness or _ahankára_ of the 190236 Sánkhyā." (Ibid p. 3).
190238 [Sidenote: 18. Om is Body. ॐ कायः ।]
190239
190240 "_Om_ is corporeal." (Ch'hándogya p. 3).
190241
190242 [Sidenote: 19. Om is Adorable ओमुपास्यं ।]
190243
190244 "The letter Om is eulogised for its adorableness, and is an inducement 190245 to its worship." (Ch'hándogya I. 9. p. 8).
190246
190247 [Sidenote: 20. Om a Vehicle ॐ रथः ।]
190248
190249 "_Om_ is the vehicle of the worship and knowledge of the superior and 190250 inferior Brahma." (Maitrí Up. 260).
190251
190252 [Sidenote: 21. Om is a Raft. ॐ मुहुपः ।]
190253
190254 "_Om_ is a raft of Brahman to cross over the torrents of the world."
190255 (Svetáswatara II. 8. p. 53).
190256
190257 [Sidenote: 22. Om an arrow. ॐ शरः ।]
190258
190259 "The body is the bow, _Om_ is the arrow, with which one pierces the 190260 mark Brahma through darkness." धनुच्छरीरमोमित्येतच्छरः । शिखास्य मनस्तमो लक्षणं

190263 [Sidenote: 23. Om a Bridge. ॐ सेतुः ।]
190264
190265 And so _Om_ is used to represent many other single objects. (Maitrí Up.
190266 p. 271).
190268 It is represented as a bridge in the Atharva Veda (VI. 10 and VIII. 4).

X. DUADS OR DUPLES OF THE BIPARTITE OM IN DUALISTIC THEORIES.

190273 [Sidenote: Duads. Om a couple. ॐ मिथुनं ।]
190274

190275 "Om_ unites couples together and gratifies the wish of the adorer."
190276 (Ch'hándogya I. 6). Again "couples being incorporated with the letter
190277 _Om_, establish the all-gratifying power and attribute of Om."
190278 (Sankara's Scholium to Ch'hándogya).

190280 [Sidenote: 1. The Couple Udgítha & Pranava. उद्गीथप्रणवौ ।]

190281
190282 _Om_ combines the _Udgítha_ of the Sáma with the _pranava_ of the Rig
190283 Veda, the first couple; and therefore speech (Vák) and breath (prána)
190284 the sources of the Rik and Sáma, the second couple; and lastly the said 190285 two Vedas themselves as the third couple. (Ch'hándogya I. 1-8), and 190286 consequently the Hotri and Udgátri priests the fourth couple.

190288 [Sidenote: 2. Brahma and Para Brahma. परापर ब्रह्म ।]

190289
190290 _Om_ is the superior and inferior Brahma conjointly. The superior or 190291 _Para Brahma_ is the one eternal and infinite God; and the inferior 190292 or _Apara Brahmá_ is the finite God:—the demiurge of Plato, and the 190293 _Prajápati_ and Indra of Vedanta theology. The Aitareya reckons the 190294 pentad of the five elementary bodies, under the latter category. (V.
190295 3). Kálidása speaks of this as the _pancha mahá bhúta samádhi_ in the 190296 first book of his Raghu Vansa.

190298 [Sidenote: 3. The two pronunciations. स्वर द्वयं ।]

190299
190300 "Om_ is pronounced as _svarati_ in the Rigveda and Svara in the Yajur 190301 Veda." (Ch'hándogya IV. 4. Manu XI. 265).

190303 [Sidenote: 4. The Human & Divine Souls. जीवात्मा परमात्मा ।]

190304
190305 "Om_ is átman or soul. Two souls are said to enter the body; the 190306 individual and the undivided or universal soul." (Ait. III. 1). "Two 190307 birds (the supreme and individual souls) dwell upon the same tree of 190308 the body." (Svetásvatara Upanishad).

190310 [Sidenote: 5. The Soul and Matter. प्रकृतीश्वरौ ।]

190311
190312 "Om_ is both spirit and matter," viewed as the same thing in the 190313 materialistic light of the Sánkhya, and dualistic view of others.
190314 Spinoza defines them both as the "_Substantia cogitans, et substantia
190315 extensa, una eademque est substantia, quae jam sub hoc, jam sub illo
190316 attributo_ comprehenditur." (Ethics. 1 Pr. 7 schol).

190318 [Sidenote: 6. The Male and Female. प्रकृति पुरुषौ ।]

190320 "_Om Strípum_ the divine male and female"; the original androgyne or 190321 bisexual being combined in the person of the first human being, Brahmá or 190322 Adam, and called the _Prakriti-purusha_ or _pradhána_ &c., in the Yoga 190323 and Puranic Systems. So says Manu also (I, 32). "The power became half 190324 male half female or nature active and passive, and divided itself in 190325 twain." (Ibid).

190327 [Sidenote: 7. The cause and effect. कार्य कारण ।]

190329 "Om_ implies the two states of mundane existence, _viz_, the cause
190330 dynamic and the effect energy. The effect also is two fold, the gross 190331 and subtile." (स्थूल सूक्ष्मज्ञ).

190333 [Sidenote: 8. The Two Elements. स्थूल सूक्ष्मौ ।]

190335 The subtile elements (सूक्ष्मतन्मात्रं) and the gross elements
190336 (स्थूलभौतिकं) forming the Sthúla or gross body and the _linga Saríra_
190337 or subtile body,—the two component parts of all living bodies.

190339 [Sidenote: 9. Knowledge & Ignorance. विद्या विद्ये ।]

190341 The two states of the soul, knowledge and ignorance (विद्या अविद्या)
190342 and the two states of knowledge; namely that which is known (विज्ञात), 190343 and what is unknown (अविज्ञात), corresponding with two others—the (ब्यक्ताब्यक्त) the manifest and unmanifest.

[Sidenote: 10. The two states of Life. कर्म तथा ज्ञानकाण्डं ।]

Knowledge and action or Jnána and Karman,—theory and practice, are the two inseparable conditions of life; the one leading to the other, which is the result of the former, and according to others its cause, in the celebrated dispute ज्ञानं जयति कर्म अथवा कर्मजं ज्ञानं between theorists and practitioners.

[Sidenote: 11. Other Pairs.]

In this way many other pairs are joined together forming as they were the two halves of the great circle of _Om_, and whether diametrically or obversely opposed or attached to each other, they form together, the same circle of which each of them is but an imperfect part or half.

[Sidenote: 12. Geometry of _Om_.]

[Sidenote: 13. Logical Use of _Om_.]

Hence we see the mystery of the cypher of _Om_ to be no less wonderful and efficacious in the investigation of theological truths, than the great instrument of Euclid's compass in the bisection and measurement of geometrical dimensions. And as the circle is latterly found to be made use of in the demonstration of propositions in Logic, how much must we wonder to reflect on the use and application of the sacred instrument of _Om_ by the ancient Rishis of India, to all things of the physical, intellectual and spiritual world (_Sarvamankára eva_) as their common measure.

[Sidenote: 14. Dualism overthrown द्वैतोच्छेदः]

Having thus observed the deficiency of dualities and the imperfection of dualistic theories, by the instrumentality of _Om_, and the application of its cypher of unity to them, to make up that unity which is essential to the true knowledge of God, whose nature is a perfect unity and without divisibility (Ekamevadvitía), the sages next proceeded to the investigation of trialities and pluralities of tri-une doctrines and so forth, which had been gaining ground even in those early stages of society, by the application of the same test of the unity of _Om_ to them, till at last all these partitions are lost in the cypher of One indivisible whole.

[Sidenote: 15. The Metrical Sense of _Om_.]

_Om_ in the sense of a compass or metrical instrument, is derived from O the cypher, letter or circle, and _ma_ to measure, meaning the circle of measurement.

XI. TRIADS OR TRIPLES OR TRIPARTITE OM IN TRINITARIAN SYSTEMS.

[Sidenote: 1. Triads or Triples of _Om_ त्रिमूर्ति ।]

"But when considered as a trilateral word consisting of a, u, _m_, (अ, उ, म्), _Om_ implies, the three Vedas, the three states of human nature; the three divisions of the Universe; the three deities, agents of the three states of things—the creation, preservation and destruction; or properly speaking; the three principle attributes of the Supreme Being. In this sense it implies in fact the Universe controlled by the Supreme Being." Rám Mohun Roy.

The idea of the trisection of the circle of _Om_ followed that of its bisection, together with that of the three fold division of Divine nature, much earlier in the minds of the Aryans of India, than the three sectors of the circle were unfolded by Euclid, and the mystery of the tri-une nature of the Divinity was discovered by the divine Plato, or that of the three persons in the God-head was revealed by the Gospel. But not content with this discovery, the ancient sages applied this triplicate division of _Om_ to many other things as the three fold manifestations of the _One_ Deity represented by the trilateral and trilateral figure of _Om_, and fell to their adoration, until they were recalled to the worship of the invisible unity of _Om_ by the Vedánta doctrines. We shall now see these triples called the Vyáhrítis (व्याहृति) or three fold manifestations in their order.

_Om_ represents the three Vedas by its three letters, _viz_ ; the Rik, Yajur and Sáman, consisting of the Hymns, Ceremonies and Psalms. The first like the hymns of Hesiod and Orpheus, the second like the Levitican laws, and the third resembling the Psalms of David, all of which are said to be of Divine origin.

[Sidenote: 2. The 3 States. ॐ गुणत्रयं ।]

These have no apposite terms in English, and are variously rendered to express the states of quietism, action and passion or excess of a feeling, leading to error.

[Sidenote: 3. The 3 Worlds. ॐ भूर्भुवः स्वर् ।]

The earth, sky and heavens, called the three great evolutions (महा व्याहृति) of _Om_. But those were afterwards subdivided into twenty one (3×7) each named as Om (ॐ त्रिसप्त) as in the beginning of Atharva Sanhitá ॐ त्रिसप्ता ये परियन्ति विश्वाः—"The Universe composed of thrice seven worlds."

[Sidenote: 4. The 3 states of things. श्रवस्थात्रयं ।]

[Sidenote: 5. The 3 Agencies Personified त्रि मूर्ति ।]

These are the creation, preservation, and destruction of all things (सृष्टि, स्थिति, प्रलय), or as philosophically called their evolution, sustentation and dissolution (उत्पत्ति, स्थिति, ध्वंस), and their agents, _Brahmá_ the creator, _Vishnu_ , the preserver, and _Siva_ the destroyer of each and all, corresponding with Jupiter, Neptune and Pluto, and Osiris, Horus and Typhon (ब्रह्माविष्णुशिवः). But this trinity is refuted by the Vedántic doctrine of unity, which repudiates a secondary cause. (सृष्टि स्थिति लयादीनां नाय कर्ता द्वितीयकं). The Maitrí Upanishad makes mention of many more triads which were glorified with the aforesaid hallowed epithet _Om_ (VI. 5.) _Viz._ the following:—

[Sidenote: 1. The Trisex Divinity.]

_Om_ composed of the three genders, masculine, feminine and neuter (स्त्रीपुत्रपुं). But the Vedánta refutes the generic distinctions of the One unknown (नपण्डनपुमान् शक्तिः).

[Sidenote: 2. The 3 Elemental forms.]

The fire, wind and sun, (सूर्याग्नि वायु), the three powerful manifestations of the Deity each of which had its votaries in the early fire, wind and sun worshippers of India.

[Sidenote: 3. The 3 Agencies as above.]

The creation, preservation and destruction of things in the forms of Brahmá, Vishnu and Siva as said above.

[Sidenote: 4. The 3 Fires. अग्नित्रयः ।]

_Om_ the three sacrificial fires called the दक्षिणा, गार्हपत्य and आहनीयास्य, which were continually preserved in families.

190482 [Sidenote: 5. The 3 Vedas. त्रयोविद्या ।]

190484 _Om_ the triple learning contained in the Rik, Yajur and Sáman, which 190485 were identified with God for their being his words.

190487 [Sidenote: 6. The 3 Intelligences.]

190488

190489 The three Intellectual faculties consisting of the Mind, Intellect or 190490 Reason, and the conscious soul.

190491

190492 [Sidenote: 7. The 3 Times. त्रिकाल ।]

190493

190494 Present, past and future composing the circle of the eternity of _Om_

190495 (कालत्रयं).

190497 [Sidenote: 8. The 3 Aliments. अन्न ब्रह्म ।]

190498

190499 Food and water and moon. The water and food are eulogised as _Om_ in 190500 Bhrigu Valli as अन्न ब्रह्म, and the moon is reckoned as such for its 190501 containing the ambrosial beverage of the gods.

190503 [Sidenote: 9. The Mental Powers. मनोवृत्तिः ।]

190504

190505 The three intellectual faculties, the mind, intellect and consciousness

190506 as the spiritual manifestations of the Invisible Spirit.

190508 [Sidenote: 10. The three Vital Airs. प्राणादि ।]

190510 Those of respiration, circulation and secretion called प्राणामान समाणाः

190511 the respiratory breath or air and others: there are two others which 190512 with these three will be found among the pentads (पञ्चप्राणाः).

190513

190514 [Sidenote: 11. The three feet of God. त्रिपादाः ।]

190515

190516 These are the different hypostases of God or rather of the Divine

190517 soul in its three states of universality, individuality and external 190518 appearances, each of which is subdivided into three states.

190520 [Sidenote: 12. The 3 Totals.]

190521

190522 The Sūtrátmá, Taijana and Hiranyágarbha (universal soul)

190523 (सूत्रात्मा तैजस हिरण्यगर्भः); The three emanations of infinite Intelligence from the 190524 Unity of God.

190525

190526 [Sidenote: 13. The three Specials.]

190527

190528 The Visva, Taijasha, and Prajná (Individual Souls) (विश्व तैजस प्रज्ञा). The 190529 three emanations of finite souls from Divine Intelligence.

190530

190531 [Sidenote: 14. The three externals.]

190532

190533 The Vaiswánara, Visvarúpa and Virát the three manifest and visible

190534 forms; (विश्वानर विश्वरूप विराट्). Hence the nature of God is a triplicate 190535 threefold unity or the thrice three hypostases of the One Being.

190591
190592 [Sidenote: I. Tetrads of Om.]
190593
190594 We have next to consider the tetrads or quadruple divinities in the 190595 quadrants or four fold divisions of the circle of Om consisting of 190596 its four letters a, u, or crescent of Om, and the circlet of entire 190597 Om styled Chandravindu as given by Professor Monier Williams from the 190598 Nirukta of yaska. (Indian Wisdom p. 169).

190603 namely, ध्वनि पश्यन्ती मध्यमा and बैस्वरी ।
190604
190605 2. Of Grammarians; the four parts of speech, nouns, verbs, prepositions 190606 and particles.
190607
190608 3. Of Ritualists; The hymns, liturgical precepts, Bráhmaṇas and ordinary 190609 language.
190610
190611 4. Of philologers or Sábdkas; the speech of serpents, beasts, birds and 190612 vernaculars.
190613
190614 5. Of Etymologists; The Rik, Yajur and Sáma Vedas and current language.
190615
190616 6. Of Spiritualists; The language of beasts, wild animals, musical 190617 instruments and soul.
190619 7. Of Manu (IV. 126). The Pranava and the three Vyahrtis. (ॐ भूर्भुवः स्वः).

8. Of Manu (IV. 124). The Rik sacred to the gods, the Yajur relating to mankind and the Sáma concerning the manes, and its sound.

9. Of Smártas; The four stages;—of students, householders, mendicants and ascetics.

10. Of Puránas. The four Ages;—Satya, Tretá, Dwápara and Kali. The four castes &c.

[Sidenote: III. In Divinity]

A for ápta or Vyápta—pervading all worlds, represents the divine hypostasis of Viswa.

[Sidenote: 1. The 4 Conditions of Brahma.]

U—for Utkarshat, i. e., more elevated than A; as the Taijas than Visva. (तैजस).

M—for mána or measure, as the prajná like a prastha measures the above two. (प्रज्ञा).

Om—i. e., the entire and without parts, is the fourth and perfect condition of Brahma. (ब्रह्म).

[Sidenote: 2. The 4 states of the Soul.]

Á for the waking (Jágrat) state, when the soul is subject to gross senses.

U—for the swapna or dreaming state, when the soul is withdrawn from visible objects.

M—the susupta or sound sleeping state, in which the soul is unconscious of itself.

Om—the absolute and perfect state of the soul viewing all in itself.

[Sidenote: 3. The 4 Manifestations of God.]

A—is external manifestation of the Universal soul in objects.

U—Internal manifestation perceived in the operations of the soul in dream.

M—unmanifested existence; or the self consciousness of the soul.

Om—Unmanifest state of the soul, unmodified and inactive state.

[Sidenote: 4. The 4 Titles of the soul.]

A—Viswa or Vaiswánara who abides manifest in the waking state.

U—Taijasa; abiding in dreams and knowing all without objects.

M—Prajná, the perfect wise abiding in deep sleep.

Om—Absolute Brahma called Turiya which is perfect and all knowing.

[Sidenote: The Four fold Tetrads:]

I.

A—Áptah, pervading.

U—Utkarsha, Exalted.

M—Mána, Measure.

Om—Brahma, Absolute.

XIII. THE PENTADS &C., OF _Om_.

[Sidenote: The Pentads of Om.]

The quintuples of om are composed of five letters or divisions of the symbolical circle, standing for so many different things each of which forms a part of the whole, and is called an _Om_. The five parts are, A, U, M, O and the _náda_—the nasal half circle above.

[Sidenote: 1. The Five Vital Airs. पञ्च प्राणाः ।]

Respiration, flatulence, circulation, pulsation and assimilation, commonly known by the names of _Prána_, _Apána_, _Vyána_, _Udána_ and _Samána_.

[Sidenote: 2. The Five Caverns. पञ्च कोषाः ।]

_Pancha koshas_ or sheaths of the soul, folding one over the other “like the coats of an onion”. 1. The sheath of the intellect. 2. The sheath of the mind. 3. The sheath of breathing. 4. The subtle and corporeal bodies. 5. The sheath of Supreme bliss, not admitted by all. (बिज्ञानमय, मनोमय, प्राणमय, अन्नमय, आनन्दमय कोषाः ।)

[Sidenote: 3. The Five Internal organs, senses and their objects. पञ्च ज्ञानेन्द्रियाणि ।]

The ear, eye, skin, nose and tongue, of hearing, sight, feeling, smell and taste. Their five objects—sound, colour, touch, savour and smell. (श्रोत्रत्वक् चक्षु जिह्वा घ्राणानि तथा शब्द स्पर्शरूप रसगन्धानि ।)

[Sidenote: 4. The Five external Do. पञ्च कर्मेन्द्रियाणि ।]

The voice, hands, feet, the organs of generation and secretion are organs of action. बाक्पाणि पाद पायूपस्थानि बहिरिन्द्रियाणि । पूर्वोक्तानि अन्तर बा बुद्धीन्द्रियाणि ।

[Sidenote: 5. The Five Elements. पञ्च भूतानि ।]

Earth, air, fire, water and ether. क्षित्यप् तेजो मरुद्योम पञ्च महाभूतानि ।

[Sidenote: 6. The Five classes of Ignorance.]

- 1. Obscurity (तमसः), 2. Illusion (मोहः), 3. Extreme illusion (महामोहः),
- 4. Gloom (तमिस्रः), 5. Utter gloom (अन्ध तमसः).

[Sidenote: 1. The six letters of Hexads or sextuples.]

The sextuples of _Om_ are composed of _a_, _u_, _o_, _m_, the _Vindu_, cypher, and the náda; and according to another account, the Ardha mátrá of Om is the fourth and the Vindu and náda the fifth and sixth aksharas. (Weber's Ráma Tapaníya p. p. 292, & 312. Cowell's Maitrí Up. p. 271).

[Sidenote: 2. The 6 Organs.]

The five organs of sense; viz the nose, tongue, the eye, ear, skin and the mind. (Gotama Sutra I. 1, 12). But according to others the mind is not reckoned an organ.

[Sidenote: 3. Other Sextuples]

The six seasons (षडृतः), the six flavours (षड्रासः), the six musical modes (षड्गाः), the six Vedángas; but I never met a passage of their being preceded by Om.

[Sidenote: 1. The Heptads or Septuples.]

The Septuples are formed by a, u, o, m, Vindu, náda and Sánta or ultimate silence, and these are used to symbolise the pantheistic form of the god Viráj, in the following description of him given by Sankara.

[Sidenote: 2. The 7 Parts of Viráj Body.]

"His head—the heavens; his eye—the sun; his breath—the wind; his center—the ether; his urine—the water; his feet—the earth; his mouth the fire." Anquetil gives the five senses, the mind and intellect as his seven members. (Weber's Indian Studien. Vol. II. p. 107).

[Sidenote: 3. The Other Heptads.]

According to other accounts there is a sevenfold septuples included in the figure Om comprising the Universe. The first trisaptaka or triplex septuple comprises the seven spheres of heaven, the seven pátálas or infernal regions, and the seven Bhuvanas of earth. The second trisapta consists of the sapta dwípas or seven continents of the earth, the seven oceans, and the seven planets; and lastly the sapta swara or the seven notes emitted by the planetary motions.

[Sidenote: The Octads or octuples.]

The octuples consist of the aforesaid seven parts and the sákti or word namo added to them at the end, and are used as symbols of Viráj for the five vital airs, or the five organs of action and those of intellect i. e. the mind, intellect and self consciousness or chítta.

[Sidenote: The Nonads.]

These are nine cavities of the body नवद्वारगृह the abode of Brahma.

[Sidenote: The Decads.]

These are the ten internal and external organs (पञ्चकर्मेन्द्रिय and पञ्चबुद्धीन्द्रिय) of the body—the seats of Brahma.

XIV. PHILOSOPHY OF THE NUMERICAL GROUPS CONTAINED UNDER THE MYSTIC SYLLABLE OM.

[Sidenote: 1. Inquiry into the numerical groups.]

After the lengthy account we have given of the various classes of words contained under the different numbers and divisions and subdivisions of the mysterious letter Om, it must be asked by the inquisitive reader, what do these clusters of concrete and abstract terms which are numerically jumbled together under the unintelligible character Om serve to mean, and of what use are they to the contemplative Yogi in his meditation on the attributes of his Maker by that symbol?

[Sidenote: 2 (_a_). Enlargement of the understanding.]

In answer to this query we are bound to repeat the definition of yoga, that it is the process of joining the ideas in the mind, and practicing the limited powers of the understanding to rise by degrees from their grasping the ideas of unities or single objects at a time, to the comprehension of dualities and pluralities for the enlargement of the intellect, till at last the mind is fraught with a clear and distinct idea of every thing in the universe comprised under the several groups or generalizations of particulars.

And also as we have more than once mentioned in the preceding articles, that God is \_aham bahushyám\_—one in many, \_to on to pan\_ of the Greeks, or the \_unity\_ divided into and containing an \_Infinity\_ of parts; so His symbol the holy Om is one circle and emblem of infinity, which for the sake of our conception and convenience is viewed in its Finite parts of monads &c., and their ever increasing multiples by all other numbers. But the monad like the prime number one whether multiplied or divided by any number in arithmetic, remains still the same simple one. Thus  $(1 \times 2 = 2 \times 1)$ ; (and  $1/2 = 1 \div 2$ , or  $1/2 = 1 \times 1/2$ ). This is the root of the pantheistic doctrine of the Vedánta. सर्वं खल्विदं ब्रह्म This One is all: and the whole being taken from the whole the remainder is whole. पूर्णस्य पूर्णमादाय पूर्णमिवावशिष्यते ।

[Sidenote: 3. The Numerical Philosophy.]

It was the oldest _Sánkhya_ or numerical school of philosophy in India, like the ancient Ionian school of Greece, that first made a classification of all objects in nature under certain co-ordinate groups for our contemplation of them under those classes; which its later development of the _yoga_ system has converted to the objects of our meditation as same with or pervaded by the Deity; or in other words, has recommended the meditation of nature's God in nature itself as in Natural Theology. It was the Tantra worship of later ages that divided the symbol of unity and infinity of the divine _om_ into a decad of parts, as it is the custom of mathematicians to divide the great circle of infinity into 360 degrees, though it might be divided into an infinity of parts.

[Sidenote: 4. The Sánkhya and Pythagorean.]

The Sánkhya system of evolution which is closely allied to that of the Darwinian, views the monad as the elementary \_protozoa\_, which combined with other monads make up the duads, triads &c. we have mentioned before, and all which are resolvable to the primary monad. Om is always 'one' thing; nothing can destroy that numerical existence, combine the thing in every possible variety of ways, and it still remains '\_one\_.' It cannot be less than \_one\_, it cannot be more. As  $(2 = 1 + 1 = II \ \& \ 3 = 1 + 1 + 1 = III)$ . Resolve it into its minutest particles, and each particle is \_one\_. As ( $\frac{1}{2}$ ,  $\frac{1}{3}$ ,  $\frac{1}{4}$  &c.). One is the only absolute number; all others are but relations to it. The Infinite therefore must be one, and if you take infinity and the infinitesimals from the infinite, there remains also the same infinity; according to the Vedánta paradox पूर्णमदः पूर्णमिदं पूर्णात् पूर्णमुदुच्यते । and all modes of existence are but finite aspects of the Infinite.

[Sidenote: 5. Different aspects of the soul.]

The soul being a self moved monad, is one, whether it connects itself with two or with three; in other words the essence remains the same whatever its manifestations may be. The one soul may have two aspects, Intelligence and Passion, as in brutes; or it may have three aspects, as in man &c. For more of this see Lewes' History of Philosophy (Vol. I p. 33 and p. 34).

[Sidenote: 6. Query concerning Nature Worship.]

There rises another question of some importance in this place as, what has the Yogi or worshipper of God to do with the objects presented to him in the different groups under the partitions of _Om_, when his business is solely to meditate on the nature and attributes of the Deity?

[Sidenote: 7. Spiritual Worship.]

To this it may be answered that, the Hindu Yogi or meditative sage is enjoined to meditate on the Supreme Spirit in Spirit, "átmá átmanyeva chintayet". (आत्मा आत्मन्येवचिन्तयेत्). He does not adore any visible object, but contemplates his creator with all his attributes as displayed in creation, which he sums up abstractedly in his own spirit and mind. There can be no contemplation of the inscrutable and incomprehensible nature of God apart from the light we derive from the abstract meditation of all sensible and intellectual natures. "Observe every thing in thyself and so shalt thou behold the Supreme."

सर्व्वमात्मगतं पश्यतेनात्मानं परिपश्यसि ।

[Sidenote: 8. Self knowledge. What?]

The old rule of self knowledge आत्मतत्त्व or know thyself आत्मानं जानीहि, which was believed to constitute highest wisdom, and which has given rise to different interpretations in various schools of philosophy, does not mean the knowledge of one's state and nature to be sufficient for him; but that of his soul which makes him truly great. The wise Socrates looked inwards, and there discovered the moral and psychological truths the world has derived from him. His pupil the divine Plato looked within him, and there found the eternal ideas of which sense awakened reminiscence.

[Sidenote: 9. Knowledge of the Soul.]

The Hindu Yogi too looks inward and views within the circle of his cranium symbolized as _Om_, his soul seated as a ray and figure of the Divinity, and encompassed by the abstract ideas of all things whose impressions he has received by sense and mind. He then learns to distinguish by his discriminative power called the _átmánátma viveka_, (आत्मानात्मविवेक) the soul of the Universe from all the representations which it presents to his mind.

[Sidenote: 10. Of one in Many.]

The Platonic system had also a sort of classification in which the search for One in Many and Many in One, together with the detection of the One in the Many was the constant aim, consult for further information on this head in Lewes' History of Philosophy. (Vol. 1. p. 237 and p. 405).

XV. THE UNITARIAN FORMULA ॐ तत् सत् ONE THAT IS.

[Sidenote: 1. Om the one.]

From all our investigation into the origin, rise, and extent of meaning of the word _Om_ in its orthography, etymology and theology, it is evident that the Indo-Aryan mind was early infused with the idea of an absolute _Om_ corresponding with the Greek _On_ and _ôn_, and _En_ and also _Aeon_ of the Gnostics, Latin _Ens_, _Unum_ and Entity, Romance _On_ and _un_, and _one_ in English, whose unity was the source of all diversity in the plurality of creation, agreeably to the text _aham bahu Syám_ = _Ego multus sim_ of the Sruti.

[Sidenote: 2. The Universal soul, = Viśwátman.]

It was at first known as _one_ and then as the _self_ or soul by the silent and innate intuition of the intellect, as it is declared in the

Mandukya Upanishad II. 2, 5. तमेबैकं जानथ आत्मानमन्यावाचो, बिमुञ्चथ अमृतस्यैव सेतुः ।
मण्डूकं २।२१५ ।

Max Müller says (A. S. Lit. p. 23 and p. 322): "The Ātman was next conceived as the Spirit = air, ātmā and anime." "That one breathed breathless by itself: other than it nothing since has been." Thus says the Sruti (Müller p. 560). "This one Ātman (atmos) fills, animates and pervades the whole"; as the poet sings "spreads unspent" throughout the infinity of worlds:

"Which are but parts of one undivided whole whose body nature is, and God the soul." (Pope).

एकमेवाद्वितीयं ब्रह्म । रूपं रूपं प्रतिरूपं विभाति ॥

[Sidenote: 3. Called as Tat = that]

The inherent one of all ones "to on ontwn," the unit of unities, the Ens of entities, the soul of the world "Viswātman" was yet without a name, nor did they know how to call him, than by the designation of tat = "that," which they say is expressive of the idea of Brahma तदिति ब्रह्मणोऽभिधानमुदाहृतं । Because says Vāchaspati, the nature of the one Om, was unknown even to the learned विदुषां परोक्षत्वाच्च तच्छब्दो ब्रह्मणो नाम; and therefore it was specified by the demonstrative pronoun that "tat," which sometimes preceded the एक as तदेकं &c. (Greek to on). The necessity of pronouncing Om with tat sat in the beginning of every Vedic rite, is strictly enjoined in Bhāgavad-Gītā. ॐ तत्सदिति निर्देशो ब्रह्मनस्तिविधः स्मृतः । ब्राह्मणश्चैव वेदाश्च यज्ञाश्चबिहिताः पुरा । वैदिके कर्मणि तेषां प्रथमतो निर्देशः । इति तां वाचस्पतिः ।

[Sidenote: 4. The Impersonal and Personal God.]

The word "tat" in the neuter gender, was used for the one self, which as an element or material cause, had evolved all things out of its immaterial essence, and expressed an impersonal God, which the creed of the early philosophers had established in the Vedas. It was at a much later period that the belief of a personal God, is said to have been introduced by the sage Sāndilya in the Ch'hāndogya and Svetāsvatara Upanishads, where the self आत्मा is used in the masculine gender, and the masculine pronoun Sa and tam (Greek "ho and ton," Lat "is"), was substituted for tat (Greek to Lat id) in the subjective mantra सोऽहं हंस; but in the objective mantra it is neuter as तत्त्वमसि ।

[Sidenote: 5. Of the Brāhma Samāja]

The Brāhma Samāj has preserved both the formula of the Impersonal God (ॐ तत् सत्) as their motto, as well as addressed their prayers to the personal God by use of the masculine pronoun sa and tam instead of tat. Thus in the opening hymn of Ram Mohun Roy's Prayer Book तमेकं शरण्यं तमेकं बरेण्यं तमेकं जगत् कारणं विश्वरूपं । तमेकं जगत् कर्तृपात् प्रहर्तुं तमेकं विश्वरूपं निर्बिकल्पं भजामि । So in Devendra Natha Thākura's hymn तमेकं स्मरामो तमेकं भजामो । This is in accordance to the creed of all civilized nations to apply the masculine pronoun to the Deity. The Koran has "ho=he" in its formulas of "Ho'lahad" "Ho'lghani" &c., and so also the ho of the Bible. Tat like On is sometimes used alone and by itself for God, at the opening of books and chapters, and upon the tops of pages with the Sat following it as तत् सत्.

[Sidenote: 6. Ditto in the Feminine Gender.]

But those who have heard the preachings of Keshub Chandra Sen, may well remember his exclamations as तुमि पिता तुमि माता, तुमि पुरुष तुमि प्रकृति, in imitation of the Roman idolatrous philosopher's acclamation to God, "tu pater, tu mater, tu mas, tu femme" &c., in Cudworth's Intellectual System. There is no masculine or feminine representative of the pronoun tat or any other pronoun in the vernaculars, where they are all of the common gender, hence तिमि, उमि, ओ, से &c., used for tat by the Heathen Hindus, are applied alike to their gods and goddesses, while the Sanskrit sah = ho in Greek, Arabic and Hebrew designates the masculine Deity only. Mahommed says in the Koran, "ye are ashamed of your female children, but not of assigning female attributes to the Deity."

[Sidenote: 7. Ditto in the Neuter Gender.]

The following passages will serve to show the early creed of the impersonal God, from the application of the neuter pronoun _tat_ to him in the Mándukya Upanishad. (11. 2)

तदेतदक्षरं ब्रह्मसप्राणस्तदबाङ्मनः ।
तदेतत् सत्यं तदमृतं तद्विद्वद्ब्रह्म सौम्यबिद्धि ॥
तदेतत् सर्वाश्रयः आयम्य तद्बाब गतेन चेतसा ।
लक्ष्यं तदेवाक्षरं सौम्य बिद्धि ॥
तद्विज्ञानेन परिपश्यन्ति धीराः ।
आनन्द रूपममृतं यद्विभाति ॥
तत् शुभ्रं तद् ज्योतिषां ज्योतिस्तदात्मबिदो बिदुः ।
तमेवभान्तमनुभाति सर्व्वं, तस्य भाषा सर्व्वमिदम्बिभाति ॥

Meaning:—"The sun, moon and stars what are they? But a glimpse of light caught from That (_Tat_)."

XVI. ONTOLOGY OF THE SELF EXISTENT _Sat_ = BEING.

[Sidenote: Philology of Sat.]

1. The last word of the formular motto of Vedánta is _sat_, which derived from the root _asa_, Lat. _esse_—to be, makes the present participle _Sat_ and means a being, like the Latin _ens_ and Greek _On_, the participial noun of _eimi_ meaning a being. Thus the knowledge of _sat_ which is _Satyam_ = reality, is the doctrine of _On_—the real being, which as said before is _to on_ onton_—the being of beings and prime cause of all existences, and forms the main subject of Ontology. This primary and fundamental truth of the existence of a first cause, led the Rishi _a priori_ to deduce all other existences from it by the text अहं बहुस्यां Ego in multis et pluribus_—the one in many: or in other words, when the Bráhma believes in but one real being in the Universe, he believes also that this being constitutes the Universe. (M.W. Indian Wisdom p. 36).

[Sidenote: 2. Etymology of Sat.]

2. The noun _Sat_ in its verbal form is equivalent to _asti_, corresponding with Lat. _est_, Gr. _esti_, Persic _ast_ and _hast_, Bengali-_áchhe, Uria _achchhe_ &c. Eng. _is_, Ger. _Ist_ and the like. And _tat sat_ together makes the Greek _to estin_, Lat. _Id est_ French _Il est_ &c.; Arabic _alast_, Persic _ost_, and Hindi _Ohihae_. The Om _Tat Sat_ is either an identic proposition, meaning the "Being that is" or a definitive one, expressing _Om_ that (is) existent.

[Sidenote: 3. The Ontology of _Sat_ or Being.]

3. The Ch'hándogya Upanishad says; "In the beginning there was the mere state of _sat_—being (_to on_)—the one only without a second." Some however say that, "in the beginning there was a state of _asat_—not being; (_Lat. non est_, Gr. _to mi on_), the one without a second. Hence out of a state of non-being would proceed a state of being. But how can this be? How can _sat_ = being, proceed out of _asat_ not being?" It is logically absurd by the well known maxim _Ex nihilo nihil fit_ of Lucretius. "Hence in the beginning there was a mere state of being (the _om_). One only without a second. (_om eka mevá dvitíyam_ ओमेकमेवाद्वितीयं). He willed and became many" (Chánd. VI. 2. M. W. Ind. Wisdom p. 41).

[Sidenote: 4. A Priori Argument of Vedánta.]

4. The Original text runs thus.

सदेवइदमग्र आसीत्, एकमेवाद्वितीयं ।
तदाह एकेआहुः असदेवइदमग्रमासीत् एकमेवाद्वितीयं ॥
तस्मादसतः सज्जायेत ।
कुतस्तुखलु स्यादिति । कथमसतः सज्जायेत इति ॥
तत्त्वेवइदमग्रआसीत्, एकमेवाद्वितीयं ॥
तदैक्षत बहुस्यां प्रजायेय ।

The above cited passage and numerous other texts of the Vedānta such as the following, यतो वा इमानि भूतानि जायन्ते येन जातानि ।and जन्माद्यस्य यतोऽन्वयात् &c., unanimously prove _a priori_ and by deductive reasoning that Brahma is the primary cause from which all others are derived and deduced by reason. This is called the _Pūrva vat_ or _a priori_ reasoning in the Nyaya philosophy, which is shewn to be the logical inference of the effect from its cause. यत्र कारणेन कार्यमनुमीयते यथा मेघोन्नत्या भविष्यति वृष्टिरिति । वात्स्यायनः ।१ ।१ ।६ ।

[Sidenote: 5. Evidences of the First cause.]

5. The priori inference of a pre-existent cause is supported by many other modes of reasoning as we shall state below. 1. By the Cosmological reasoning of Humboldt, Leibnitz and others, it is evident that some being was uncaused, or was of itself without a cause. Therefore God is the first cause of all things. (Leibnitz). 2. By the Anthropological reasoning founded on certain observed facts or phenomena of human consciousness, its knowledge of the subjective _ego_ and objective _non ego_ &c. 3. By the Ontological, we find the existence in the mind of a clear and distinct idea of God, as a perfect Being or _Ens_ or entity (sat) perfectly eminent. 4. Psychological Intuitive reasoning shows us clearly that "we may form the idea of a supremely perfect being of whom we have a conscious proof. And as in the exercise of our intellect we become conscious of a subjective unity underlying the external diversity, so by the unvarying revelations of reason, we are led to recognize the existence of a Deity who, amidst all the shifting phenomena of the universe remains one and Immutable." Vide Devendra Náth Tagore's Ontology p. 14.

[Sidenote: 6. A Posteriori Argument.]

The Vedānta philosophy pursues also a course of inductive reasoning in its aphorism of जन्माद्यस्य यतः । अस्य विश्वस्य जन्मादि यतः, rising from the creation to its maker. This is the process of परवत् or _a posteriori_ reasoning of the Nyāya philosophy, in its inference of the cause fire from its effect the smoke (पर्वतो वह्निमान् धुमात्), or of the major term व्यपकाग्नि from the middle व्यपक्षम । This is the physical reasoning of modern inductive science, which infers from the facts of existence an author of these facts. The Universe exists, therefore it has a cause, which is prior to all other causes. There are some who attempt to prove the posteriori परवत् argument of the Veda from a different construction of the Gáyatri hymn, ascending from the _Vyáhritis_ or creation of the worlds (भूर्भुवःस्वर्) to their creator तत् सविता; but this mode of reasoning is not justified by others, by reason of the initial Om = God.

We shall now take notice of the other meanings which the lexicons assign to _sat_, beside the being and entity of God परमार्थ सत्त्व we have so long dwelt upon. It means the goodness and excellence of a thing. साधुत्वप्रशस्तादिभिः सच्छब्दोऽपि । वाचस्पत्याभिधानं ॥

In this sense the phrase _Om tat sat_ would mean "God The Good", which is quite correct on all hands. In English the etymology of God is good, and so the Sanskrit _sat_ means both God and good; thus also all systems of philosophy predicate the attribute of goodness of the nature of God. The Persian term _Khoda_ though so nearly allied to God and _sat_ in sound, will be found to bear no affinity with either; but to owe its derivation to the Sanskrit स्वदा (from स्वदत्तः) meaning self-produced;

_swa_ स्व being invariably rendered into _kha_ in Persian, as _swata_ स्वत_khod_, _swasri_ स्वस् khwahir &c.

[Sidenote: 8. Another sense of _Sat_.]

_Sat_ appears moreover in the sense of sitting in composition with an objective word preceding it, as _diri-shad_ a celestial, _sabhásat_ a courtier. It is from the root _sad_, Latin _sedo_—to sit, with the suffix _kwip_. Thus we have in the Kathá Vallí: (V. 2.)

हंसः शुचिसद्वसुरन्तरीक्षः । सद्भेता वेदिषदतिथिर्दूरोन सत् ।

नृषद्वरसद्वतसद्योमसद् । सद् अब्जा गोजा ऋतजा अद्रिजाऋतं बृहत् । ५ । २ ।

"The Hansa, (God) sits above the heavens, it dwells in the atmosphere, as invokers it dwells in temples, and as guests it is not afar from us. It dwells in man, in truth, in the ether, in water, mountains &c. &c."

XVII. THE CONCLUSIVE LESSON ON THE PRACTICE OF YOGA.

After our long and lengthy discussion on the subject of Yoga, and the sacred and mysterious words wherewith it is conducted, our treatise will be deemed incomplete until we set a form or praxis of the manner in which it is to be conducted; and particularly by those who are fully persuaded of its efficacy, and prepared for its practice, but are prevented from it for want of proper guides to initiate them into it, or deterred by the arduousness of the rites imposed upon them by false Yogis, as to give up the exercise in disgust and hopelessness of their possibility ever to master it.

We shall set to these a short lesson from the Upanishad with directions from the Bhágavad Gítá, works which are believed to be of the highest authority and sanctity by every Hindu, and which can never be suspected of misleading any body; but on the other hand universally acknowledged as the only luminaries amidst the intellectual gloom of superstition and ignorance. The Kathopanishad says that the light of truth is to be gained by yoga only योगीनां योगगम्यं, and the Bhágavad Gítá declares, that knowledge, faith and practice are the only means of its attainment ज्ञानकर्म च भक्तिश्च नोपायनास्ति कुत्रचित्. It directs all men of competence to betake themselves to the acquisition of learning, and the incompetent to the practice of acts thus: निबिन्नानां ज्ञानयोगोऽन्वासिनामिहकर्मसु । तेष्यनिबिण्णं चित्तानां, कर्मयोगश्च कामिनां ॥

The Maitrí Upanishad gives the following directions for the practice of yoga. "In the same way (is declared) the rule for the exercise of these means (for the concentration of the mind). This concentration (yoga) has six parts:—restraint of the breath (_pránáyáma_), restraint of the senses (_pratyáhára_), meditation (_dhyána_), attention (_dháraná_); self examination (_tarka_), and absorption (_samádhi_). When beholding by this manner of contemplation, he beholds the golden coloured, the doer, the lord, the spirit, Brahman, the cause; then the seer abandoning his merits and sins, reduces every thing to unity in the Supreme indestructible (soul). Thus says the Sruti;—As beasts and birds approach not a blazing mountain, so faults never approach those who know Brahman". (18).

"It has been also said elsewhere when the sage, conditioned as _prána_, has obtained the mastery over his mind, and left outside all the objects of the senses, then let him remain void of all volition. Since the individual soul called _prána_ springs from the _non-prána_ (Supreme Intelligence); hence let the (apparent) _prána_ fix itself in the fourth stage (of pure intelligence). Thus saith the Sruti;—"That which is itself apart from intellect, which yet abides in the midst of intellect, the inconceivable, the supremely secret, on this let him fix his intellect (_chitta_); thus this subtle body having no object, is merged (in the Supreme)." (19).

"It hath also been said elsewhere; there is yet a higher exercise of attention (_dháraná_) for the sage; after pressing the end of his tongue against his palate and restraining his voice, mind and breath, he

191241 beholds Brahman by contemplation. When thus by the annihilation of the 191242 mind, he beholds the self-manifesting soul, the less than the least, as 191243 identified with the supreme soul, then having seen the soul thus 191244 identified, he becomes divested of self. Being thus divested, he becomes 191245 unlimited, destitute of material support, only an object of pure 191246 thought. This is the great secret,—final emancipation. Thus saith the 191247 Sruti;—By the serenity of the intellect he destroys all action, good or 191248 bad; with serene soul, abiding in the Divine Soul, he enjoys undying 191249 bliss." (20).

191251 "It hath been said also; the artery, called _sushumná_, which supplies 191252 the passage for the vital air, rises upward (from the heart) and is 191253 interrupted in the middle of the palate. By means of this artery, 191254 conjoined with the _prána_ (brought under subjection), the mind merged 191255 by contemplation into its object Brahman, and the repetition of the 191256 mystic syllable _Om_, let him rise upwards turning the end of his tongue 191257 on the palate, and uniting the senses (with the prána and mind) ]. Let 191258 the absence of limitation contemplate itself (_i. e._ let him 191259 contemplate on the unlimited Brahman). Then he attains freedom from all 191260 organs; and becomes no longer capable of pain or pleasure. He gains
191261 absolute unity." Thus saith the Sruti:—

191263 "First having mastered _prána_, then having fixed it on the palate, 191264 having crossed the state of limitation, let him in the crown of his 191265 head, merge (the soul) in the unlimited Brahman." (21).

191267 "Thus he may contemplate _Om_ as the sound and non-sound &c. (22 and 191268 23). Then _Om_ as light, and all other significates of _Om_." (24 &c.).

191270 Those who may think the English version of the lesson on Yoga as not 191271 very explicit, will do well to consult the subjoined text in the 191272 original.

191284 191285 XVIII. SYMBOLICAL YOGA CULT OF MUDRÁ OR CHAKRA DIAGRAMS.

191287 _Om_ the object of Yoga meditation, being already described in sections 191288 IX. &c. of this article as symbolical of Divine nature, and its 191289 different divisions as emblematical of the eternal attributes or 191290 hypostases of the Self—same Unity, they are as shown before, represented 191291 by the component letters of that mystic syllable, and meditated upon by 191292 the mental arithmetic of the speculative theosophist, the vedántist and 191293 yogi. But as the majority of people of grosser understandings are more 191294 dependant on ocular and sensible symbolism than abstract idealism, the 191295 Tantras have purposely contrived many a figure and diagram (_Mudrás_ and 191296 _Chakras_) for their guidance, of which we will give a few below with 191297 their geometrical names and notations.

191299 It will appear from the diagrams described hereafter that _Om_ the 191300 symbol of Brahman the Universal _Sat_ or existence, serves to show us as 191301 a chart of the world, or representation of the cranium, everything 191302 existing in the physical and intellectual world, which is expressed by 191303 the word Om (ॐ शब्द सर्वार्थवाचकः), in its different divisions and partitions
191304 for our meditation and contemplation. The pious and religious 191305 spiritualist may employ them in Divine contemplation, but the majority 191306 are at liberty to use them in the meditation of every other subject 191307 which comes to be comprised within the compass of their thought, in the 191308 groups of significations which the letters are said to convey. Hence the 191309 Yoga of old, meant only an intense application of the mind to all

191310 subjects of thought and knowledge. Thus the end of our Yoga philosophy 191311 is not only the abstruse meditation of Divine attributes, but the mental 191312 reflection of every thing besides.

191315 XIX. MATHEMATICAL INVESTIGATION INTO THE DIAGRAMS OF OM.

191317 [Sidenote: Correctness of the Diagrams.]

191319 We have seen from the diagrams given in the following section, that the 191320 Tántrika formulists have spared no pains to divide the great circle
191321 of the Universe, filled by the omnipresence of Brahma and represented
191322 by the figure om, into several parts for the purpose of meditating
191323 His different hypostases, and contemplation of the various orders of 191324 creation. We are now to inquire as to whether these several divisions
191325 of a mathematical circle of 360 degrees are geometrically correct,
191326 or mere arbitrary partitions made by ignorant priests for their own 191327 amusement and deception of their proselytes.

191329 [Sidenote: The Heptagon and Nonagon.]

191331 Now for instance, the problem of inscribing a heptagon or a nonagon
191332 in a circle will at once startle a student of Euclid as altogether
191333 impossible, and identical with that which was celebrated among Greek 191334 geometricians as the problem of the trisection of the angle. If treated 191335 algebraically, it leads to a cubic equation with three real roots, the 191336 arithmetical value of which can be found only approximately.

191338 [Sidenote: The Lílávati's solution.]

191340 The author of the Lílávati has solved the problems, but given no 191341 account of the way in which he got the numbers stated by him; if they 191342 had been obtained by solution of the above mentioned equation, they 191343 would probably have been more accurate than they are. He only lays down 191344 an arbitrary rule, that the side of the heptagon is  $52055/120000$  of the 191345 diameter, and that of the nonagon  $41081/120000$  of the same. Neither of 191346 these is very far from the truth. The accurate value of the side of the 191347 heptagon lies between  $82/182$  and  $105/242$ . The side of the nonagon lies 191348 between  $13/38$  and  $105/307$ .

191350 [Sidenote: Commentators on Lílávati.]

191352 Among the commentators on Lílávati, Rámakrishna, Gangádhara, and 191353 Ranganátha have not attempted any demonstration of the problems in 191354 question, and have contented themselves with merely repeating the 191355 figures contained in the text. Ganesa confesses that the proof of the 191356 sides of the regular pentagon, heptagon and nonagon cannot be shown in 191357 a manner similar to that of the triangle, square and octagon.

191359 [Sidenote: The Pentagon.]

191361 But this is untrue of the pentagon; its side can be geometrically found 191362 as shown in Euclid Book IV. Prop 11; and the admission of Ganesa serves 191363 only to prove, that he was unacquainted with the Sanskrit translation 191364 of Euclid which contains a solution of this problem. Ganesa cannot 191365 mean only that the side of the pentagon is incommensurable with the 191366 diameter; for that is equally true of the triangle, square and octagon, 191367 inscribed in a circle.

191370 THE FIGURES.

191372 OF OM (ON OR EN) OF HINDU ONTOLOGY.

191374 I. Mudrá, Madawar, Sphere or Sphaira.

191375 A Symbol of the Universe and Universalia.

191376 A System of the Universal Religion.

191377 ॐकार मुद्रा । अखण्डमण्डलाकारं व्याप्तयेनचराचर स्वरूपं ।

191379 II. The circle O, An Emblem of infinity and Eternity.
191380 A Type of the Catholic Theism of Hindus.
191381 ॐकार वृत्तं । अनाद्यनन्तसनातन ब्राह्मधर्मस्वरूपञ्च ।
191382
191383 III. The convexity of O. A Type of the Extramundane, 191384 Unknowable and Absolute Supreme Brahma.
191385 Significant of Agnoism and Agnosticism.
191386 ॐवृत्तपरिधेःपरं । अपरिमेयाज्ञेयतुरीयपरब्रह्म स्वरूपं ।
191387
191388 IV. The concavity of O. Emblem of Intramundane
191389 Immensity of knowable Nature and its God Brahma .
191390 And Indicative of Gnosticism and Pantheism.
191391 ॐकारवृत्तमध्यं । प्रज्ञेय निर्गुणब्रह्मतथाज्ञेयब्रह्माण्डस्वरूपं ।
191392
191393 V. The circle with the Central point or Monad.
191394 A Symbol of the Definite and known world and its God.
191395 And signifying the Monotheism of all nations.
191396 ॐवृत्तं सविन्दुमध्यं । सगुणब्रह्मविन्दुब्रह्माण्डवीजमपर तैजस ब्रह्मस्वरूपं ।
191397
191398 1. The circle with the central A, ॐAlif or Unit.
191399 Emblematical of the unity of a Personal God.
191400 And the Primary unity of all things in Nature.
191401 And significant of unitarianity or _Advaita matam_.
191402 ॐकार वृत्त केन्द्रस्थअकार सहितं । सोपाधिक एकमेवाद्वितीयमतरूपं ।
191403
191404 2. The two Semicircles of O. Symbolical of Duad or Duality .
191405 In the dualism of Persons in the God-head as _Dvaitam_.
191406 And the Duads of Co-ordinate Principles in Nature.
191407 And signifying the Ditheism of all Dualistic creeds.
191408 ॐ वृत्तार्द्धद्वयं । सोपाधिकेश्वरस्यभेदद्वयं । जीवब्रह्म पुम्प्रकृत्यादि दैतमतरूपं ।
191409
191410 3. The Trisected circle of _Om_. A symbol of the Triad or Trinity.
191411 Indicative of a Triality of Persons in the God-head as _Tritam_.
191412 And the co-ordinate Triples of the Principles in Nature.
191413 And signifying the Tritheism of Trinitarianity.
191414 त्रिभक्त वृत्तं । अउमयुक्तं । त्रिगुणात्मक ब्रह्मादित्रिमूर्ति । व्याहृति त्रयादि । त्रैतमतरूपं ।
191415
191416 3. (_a_) The Tripartite circle. With the Inscribed Triangle
191417 Euclid (IV. 2).
191418 A symbol of the Holy Trinity (_Trimūrti_ on the three sides).
191419 And the Triangular female emblem of God-mother in the midst.
191420 And Indicating the Materialistic Trinitarianism of Hindus.
191421 ॐ वृत्तान्तर्गत त्रिभुजं । अव्यक्तशक्ति वा प्रकृत्यात्मकत्रिमूर्तिरूपं । त्रैतं मतं ।
191422
191423 4. The Four Quadrants of the circle of _Om_ or a square.
191424 Emblematical of the Tetrad of the Divinity.
191425 And the co-ordinate Quadruples of Things.
191426 And signifying the Quaternary of certain creeds.
191427 ॐकारवृत्तपादाः । अउमविन्दुयुक्ताः । विश्वादितुरीय ब्रह्म । वा सप्रकृतित्रिमूर्तिरूपं ।
191428
191429 5. The Pentagon Inscribed in the circle. Denoting the Pentad.
191430 The Angular Points A. B. C. D. & E. Meeting at the Centre O
191431 (Euclid IV. 11).
191432 Indicative of the Quintuple Hypostases of the Deity.
191433 The Quintessence and the Five fold co-ordinates of Elementary
191434 bodies.
191435 ॐ वृत्तस्य पञ्चभुजं । अउमविन्दुनादयुक्तं । पञ्चकोश पञ्चप्राण पञ्चभूतमयं ।
191436
191437 6. The Hexagon in the Circle. Significant of the Hexad.
191438 The Angular Points A.B.C.D.E.F. Meeting at the centre
191439 (Euclid IV. 15).
191440 Denotative of the sextuple Evolutions of the Monad O.
191441 And Indicative of the Six Internal and External Organs of sense.
191442 वृत्तस्य षड्भुजं । ॐ नमो षोढारूपं । अउम° ७नमषडिन्द्रिय षड्भूष षडङ्गादिस्वरूपं ।
191443
191444 7. The Heptagon. Inscribed in the circle O. Indicates the Heptad.
191445 The Angular Points A. B. C. D. E. F. G. Meeting at the centre O.
191446 According to the Process of Līlāvati mentioned below.
191447 Indicates the septuple Hypostases of Divine Essence, _viz_;

191448 The Five External senses, mind and intellect. (Anquetil).
 191449 And the seven fold co-ordinate bodies in creation, _viz_;
 191450 the seven Worlds, seven Planets, seven Continents and Oceans.
 191451 ॐवृत्तस्य सप्तभुजं । अउमं ७ नमःयुक्तं । प्रज्ञादि आत्मारूपं । सप्तभुवनमयविराजरूपं ।
 191452 सप्त ग्रह सप्त द्वीप सप्त समुद्रश्च ।
 191454 8. The Octagon (A. B. C. D. E. F. G. H). Inscribed in the circle O.
 191455 By Bisection of the Quadrants (in Figure 4).
 191456 Indicative of the Octad or Octuple states of Spirit and Body.
 191457 _viz_, the five Vital airs or the five external or five 191458 Internal senses with the Mind, Intellect and consciousness (Chittam).
 191459 All forms of the Spirit.
 191460 And the eight material forms of Earth &c., treated of in the Ashta 191461 Mūrti.
 191462 ॐ वृत्तस्याष्टभुजं । ॐ नमोयुक्तं अउओमं ७ नमः । अष्ट बुद्धीन्द्रिय तथा ईश्वराष्टमूर्तिरूपं ।
 191463

191464 9. The Nonagon A, B, C, D, E, F, G, H, I. Inscribed in the circle O.
 191465 By Trisection of the three sections of a Tripartite circle.
 191466 Symbolical of a _nonad_ or nine fold nature of the Deity.
 191467 And the nine doors or organs of Animal bodies.
 191468 ॐ वृत्तस्य नव भुजं । त्रिभुजस्यत्रिभक्तभुजत्रयं । ओन्नमो शान्ति युक्तं । अउओमं ७ नमः शान्ति ।
 191469 आत्मनः नवधारूपाणि । तथाजीवदेहस्य नवद्वारानिच । आत्मनः नव रूपाणि यथा—
 191470 अ-जाग्रतं वैश्वानरः । उ-स्वप्नजतैजसः । म-सुषुप्त प्रज्ञा । ओ-तुरीयपरात्पर ब्रह्म ।
 191471 ७ नाद समष्टि सूत्रात्मा । ° विन्दुव्यष्टि हिरण्य गर्भः । नमः स्थूलविश्वः । शक्ति विश्वरूपः ।
 191472 शान्तिविराजरूपं । सर्व्वमोक्षारस्य नव रेखभिः दर्शितं । यथा ॐ
 191473

191474 10. The Decagon in a Circle. Emblematical of the Decad.
 191475 The Decagon A, B, C, D, E, F, G, H, I, J. By Bisection of the 191476 Pentagon.
 191477 Significant of the Five Internal and five External Senses.
 191478 And the Ten Directions of space. All filled by Divine Spirit.
 191479 ॐवृत्तस्य दशभुजं । वृत्तस्य पञ्च भुजद्विर्भिभक्तं । दशदिग्व्यापि ईश्वरात्माज्ञापकं ।
 191480 ॐन्नमः शक्तिःयुक्तं । यथा अ, उ, ओ, म, ७, °, नमः, शान्तिः, ।
 191481 वा अ, उ, ओ, म, ७, °, नमः शान्तिः, शान्तिः, शान्तिः ।
 191482

191483 These figures might be multiplied _ad infinitum_, as there is no
 191484 limit of created things and the attributes of the Creator; but as 191485 neither Infinity nor Immensity is comprehensible by the limited 191486 understanding of man, the Yogi takes some definite ideas and 191487 determinate objects for his meditation, as he is directed by the 191488 Natural Religion of mankind.

191491 NOTE TO FIGURE 7.

191493 Solution of the Problem of inscribing a heptagon in a circle, or 191494 dividing the circle into seven equal parts. According to Sūryadāsa's
 191495 commentary on Līlāvati. वृत्तान्तर्गत सप्तभुजाङ्कनं सूर्यदासमतं ।
 191496

191497 "For the heptagon समवाहुक सप्तभुजःdescribe a circle, and an equilateral
 191498 heptagon in it, then a line being drawn between the भुजाग्ररेखाextremities 191499 of any two sides—at pleasure, and three lines from the centre of the 191500 circle वृत्तान्तर्गत केन्द्रं to the angles indicated by those extremities
 191501 भुजाग्रचिह्नित कोणं, an unequal quadrilateral विषम चतुर्भुजं is formed. The greater 191502 sides and the least diagonal क्षुद्रतरकर्णं thereof are equal to the 191503 semi-diameter व्यसार्द्धतुल्यं". The value of the greater diagonal, which 191504 is assumed arbitrarily, is the chord of the arc चापस्य पूर्णज्या encompassing 191505 the two sides. Its arrow शरःbeing deduced in the manner before directed,
 191506 is the side of a small rectangular triangle एकजात्य त्रिभुजं ।
 191507

191508 Thus the greater diagonal बृहत्तरकर्णं, being arbitrarily assumed to be 191509 93,804, is the chord sought इष्टज्या: its arrow found in the manner directed 191510 is 22,579; this is the side, and half the base or chord जीवारूप भूम्यर्द्ध कोटि is 191511 the upright 46,902; their squares are 509711241 and 21997604; the square 191512 root of the sum of which is the side वर्गमूलं of the heptagon or 191513 52,055 योगमूलं ।
 191514

191515 These numbers are given from the copy of Sūryadāsa's commentary on the 191516 Līlāvati in the library of the As. Society. There are two obvious errors in them, probably of the copyist लिपिकर प्रमादः; viz. 22,579 should be 22.581, and 21997604 should be 2199797604.

NOTE TO FIG. 9.

To inscribe a nonagon in a circle, वृत्तान्तर्गत नवभुजं i. e., to divide it into nine parts. "A circle being described as before, inscribe a triangle वृत्तान्तर्गत त्रिभुजं in it. Thus the circle is divided into three parts. Three equal chords समान पूर्णज्या being drawn in each of these portions, a nonagon is thus inscribed in it वृत्तस्य नव भुजक्षेत्रं; and three oblongs वृत्तस्य चतुर्भुज क्षेत्रं are formed within the same; of which the base is equal to the side of the (inscribed) triangle भूमिवृत्तस्य त्रिभुजभुजतुल्यं। Then two perpendiculars लम्बपातद्वयं being drawn in the oblong, it is divided into three portions, the first and last of which are triangles परपूर्वार्ध त्रिभुजं; and the intermediate one is a tetragon. मध्यांश चतुर्भुजं। The base in each of them is a third part of the side of the inscribed triangle त्रिभुजबाहोस्त्रितीयांशः(?). It is the upright (of a rectangular triangle) जात्यत्रिभुजकोटि; the perpendicular is its side; and the square root of the sum of their squares भुजकोटिवर्गयोगमूलं is the hypotenuse कर्ण, and is the side of the nonagon नवभुजं.

"To find the perpendicular लम्बं, put an assumed chord कल्पितज्या equal to half the chord पूर्णज्यार्द्ध of the (inscribed) tetragon; find its arrow in the manner aforesaid, and subtract that from the arrow of the chord तत्रिभुजस्य शर of the (inscribed) triangle, the remainder is the perpendicular. लम्बपरिमाणं। Thus the perpendicular लम्बं comes out 21,989: it is the side of a rectangular triangle. The third part of the inscribed एकजात्य त्रिभुजं triangle is 34,641: it is the upright. कोटि। The square root of the sum of their squares वर्गयोग मूलं is 41,031: and is the side of the inscribed nonagon." वृत्तस्य नवभुजं।

BOOK I.

ON MORAL APATHY

CHAPTER I.

INTRODUCTION.

SECTION I.

DIVINE ADORATION

_Hail The Eternal._

Om, salutation to the self-same Reality, from whom all beings proceed, by whom they are manifest, upon whom they depend, and in whom they become extinct (in the end).

2. He is the knower, the knowledge and all that is to be known. He is the seer, the (act of) seeing, and all that is to be seen. He is the actor, the cause and the effect: therefore salutation to Him (who is all) knowledge himself.

3. Salutation to Him (who is) supreme bliss itself, from whom flow the dews of delight (as water springs from a fountain) both in heaven and earth, and who is the life of all.

SECTION II.

NARRATIVE OF SUTÍKSHNA.

4. One Sutíkshna, a Bráhmāna, whose mind was full of doubts, went to the hermitage of Agasti and asked the sage respectfully:—

5. Oh great sage! that art informed in all the ways and truths of virtue, and knowest with certainty all the Sástras, I am in a great doubt (about something) which I pray you will kindly remove.

6. Tell me whether a man's acts or his knowledge or both of these, is in your opinion, the cause of his emancipation.

7. Agasti replied:—

As the flight of birds in the air is effected by means of both their wings, so the highest state of emancipation is attained through the instrumentality of both knowledge and acts.

8. It is neither our acts nor knowledge alone that produces emancipation, but both together are known as the means of it.

SECTION III.

ANECDOTE OF KÁRUNYA.

9. I will recite to you an instance on this subject from the old traditions, relating a Bráhmāna named Kárunya, who was learned in the Vedas in days of yore.

10. He was the son of Agnivesya and accomplished in the Vedas and all their branches, and after finishing his studies at the preceptor's, returned to his own abode.

11. He remained a sceptic at home, holding his taciturnity and inertness to acts: when his father Agnivesya saw his son so slack in his duties, he upbraided him thus for his good.

12-13. Agnivesya said:—

Why my son do you not discharge your duties, tell me how can you succeed (in anything) if you remain inactive, and tell me also the reason of your cessation from acts.

14. Kárunya replied:—

The offering of daily oblations, and performance of morning and evening devotions during life, are inculcated in the Veda and law as the _active_ duties (of men).

15. But it is neither by acts or riches, nor by means of progeny, that one obtains his liberation, it is solely by self-denial that Stoics taste the ambrosia (of emancipation).

16. Tell me my father! which of these two ordinances is to be observed by me? Doubtful of this I have become indifferent to acts.

17. Agasti said:—

Hear me my son, that Kárunya after saying so held his silence; when his father seeing him thus, rejoined his speech.

18. Agnivesya said:—

Hear me relate a narrative (to you) my son, and you having fully considered its purport in your mind, may do as you may choose (best for you).

SECTION IV.

STORY OF SURUCHI.

19. There was a damsel named Suruchi, the best of the Apsará nymphs, who was seated on the mountain peak of Himálaya, beset by peacocks around.

20. Here Kinnaras inflamed by love sported with their mates, and the fall of heavenly streams (Gangá and Yamuná), served to expurgate the gravest sins (of men).

21. She beheld a messenger of Indra making his way through the sky; and then this most fortunate and best of Apsarás, addressed him thus:

22. Suruchi said:—

O thou herald of gods, tell me kindly whence thou comest and whither art thou destined at present.

SECTION V.

ACCOUNT OF ARISHTANEMI.

23. The divine Ariel replied:—Well hast thou asked Oh pretty browed maid, and I will tell thee all as it is. Know, Arishtanemi the royal sage, who has made over his realm to his son.

24. He has (now) with religious indifference (to the world), set out to the forest for (practice of) asceticism, and is performing his austerities on the Gandha Mádana mountains.

25. I am now returning from there after discharge of my errand, and repairing to Sakra's (palace) to report the matter.

26. Suruchi said:—

Tell me, my Lord, what matter has taken place there. I am with submission (much) inquisitive after it, nor shouldst thou cause me (the pain of) anxiety.

27. The messenger replied:—

Hear me gentle maid, relate to thee in length (everything) as it has occurred.

28. On hearing that the king was practising the utmost rigors of asceticism in that forest, Indra, the lord of gods, desired me to take this heavenly car and repair at once to the spot.

29. "Take this car," said he, "bearing the (dancing) Apsarás equipped with all their musical instruments, and furnished with a band of Gandharvas, Siddhas, Yakshas and Kinnaras."

30. "Convey them," said he, "with all their wired instruments, flutes and drums to the auspices of the Sylvan mount of Gandha Mádana."

31. "There having placed the Prince Aristanemi in the vehicle, bring him to the enjoyment of heavenly delight in this city of Amarávatí (the seat of immortals)."

32. The messenger added:—

Receiving this injunction of Indra and taking the car with all its equipments, I proceeded to that mountain.

33. Having arrived at the mountain and advancing to the hermitage of the king, I delivered to him the orders of the great Indra.

191725 34. Hearing my words, Oh happy damsel! the king spoke to me with 191726 reluctance and said: "I wish to ask thee something O messenger, which 191727 (I hope) thou wilt deign to answer.
191729 35. "Tell me what good and what evils there are in heaven, that knowing 191730 them (beforehand), I may think of settling there as I may choose."
191731
191732 36. I answered, saying:-
191733
191734 In heaven there is ample reward for merit, conferring perfect bliss (to 191735 all); but it is the degree of meritoriousness that leads one to higher 191736 heavens.
191737
191738 37. By moderate virtue, one is certainly entitled to a middle station, 191739 and virtue of an inferior order, leads a person to a lower position (in 191740 the heavens).
191741
191742 38. But one's virtue is destroyed by his impatience at the excellence 191743 of his betters, by his haughtiness to his equals, and by his joy at the 191744 inferiority of others.
191745
191746 39. When one's virtue is thus destroyed, he must enter the abode of 191747 mortals. These and the like are the effects of merit and demerit (with 191748 us) in heaven.
191750 40. Hearing this, Oh good maiden, the king answered and said: "I 191751 do not, Oh divine messenger! like the heaven that is of such like 191752 conditions.
191754 41. "I will henceforth practise the most austere form of devotion, and 191755 abandon this my unhallowed human frame in the same way, as the snake 191756 abandons his time-worn-skin (slough).
191757
191758 42. "Be thou pleased, Oh delegate of the gods! to return with thy 191759 heavenly car to the presence of the great Indra whence thou comest, and 191760 fare thee well."
191761
191762 43. The celestial emissary resumed:-
191763
191764 Thus being bid, I went Oh goodly dame to the presence of Sakra to 191765 report the matter. Who upon my rehearsal of the matter, was struck with 191766 great wonder.
191768 44. Then the great Indra again spoke to me with a sweet voice and said:
191769 "Go you my herald again to that king, and take him to the hermitage of 191770 Válmiki.
191771
191772 45. "He is well acquainted with every truth, tell him my errand for the 191773 instruction of the dispassionate prince, saying:-
191774
191775 46. 'Oh thou great sage! remonstrate with this prince who is humble and 191776 dispassionate, and dislikes the enjoyments of heaven.
191777
191778 47. 'So that this prince who is aggrieved at the miseries of the world, 191779 may gradually come to attain his emancipation.'"
191780
191781 48. I then went and explained my mission to the royal hermit, took him
191782 to the sage Válmiki (who had grown amidst the ant-hills), and to whom I 191783 delivered great Indra's charge for the king's practice (of the means) 191784 for his final liberation.
191785
191786 49. Then the sage (named after the ant-hill in which he had grown), 191787 welcomed the King with gentle inquiries regarding his welfare.
191788
191789 50. The prince replied:-
191790
191791 "Oh great _seer_, that art informed in all the truths of religion, and 191792 art the greatest of them that know the knowable, thy very sight has 191793 given me all that I desired, and therein is all my welfare.

191795 51. "Great sire, I wish to learn from thee how I may escape the 191796 miseries which arise from one's connection with this world, and which 191797 (I hope) thou wilt reveal to me without reserve."

191798
191799 52. Válmíki said:-

191800
191801 Hear me Oh king! I will relate to you the entire Rámáyana, by the 191802 hearing and understanding of which you will be saved even while in this 191803 life.

191804 191805 191806 SECTION VI.

191807 191808 HISTORY OF RÁMA.

191810 53. Hear me Oh great and intelligent king, repeat to you the sacred 191811 conversation which took place between Ráma and Vasishtha relating the 191812 way to liberation, and which I well know from my knowledge (of human 191813 nature).

191814
191815 54. The prince said:-

191816
191817 "O thou best of sages, tell me precisely who and what this Ráma was, 191818 what was his bondage and how he got freed from it."

191819
191820 55. Válmíki said:-

191821
191822 Hari was proscribed under an imprecation to take upon himself the form 191823 of a prince, with an assumed ignorance as that of a man of little 191824 understanding.

191826 56. The prince said: "Tell me who was the author of that imprecation, 191827 and how it could befall on Ráma, who was the personification of 191828 consciousness and felicity, and the very image of wisdom."

191830 57. Válmíki replied: Sanat-kumára, who was devoid of desires, had been 191831 residing at the abode of Brahmá, to which Vishnu, the Lord of the three 191832 worlds, was a visitor from Vaikuntha.

191833
191834 58. The Lord God was welcomed by all the inhabitants of the 191835 _Brahmaloka_ as well as by Brahmá himself, except by Sanat-kumára who 191836 was thus beheld and addressed to by the god.

191838 59. "Sanat-kumár, it is ignorance that makes thee forsake thy desires 191839 for fear of regeneration (on earth), therefore must thou be born under 191840 the name of _Sara-janmá_ to be troubled with desires."

191842 60. Sanat-kumára in return denounced Vishnu by saying:-"Even all 191843 discerning as thou art, thou shalt have to sacrifice thine omniscience 191844 for some time, and pass as an ignorant mortal (on earth)."

191846 61. There was another anathema pronounced upon Vishnu by the sage 191847 Bhrigu, who seeing his wife killed (by him), became incensed with anger
191848 and said: "Vishnu thou shalt have also to be bereft of thy wife."

191849
191850 62. He was again cursed by _Vrindá_ to be deprived of his wife, on 191851 account of his beguiling her (in the form of her husband).

191853 63. Again when the pregnant wife of Deva-datta was killed (with fear)
191854 on seeing the man-lion figure of Vishnu;

191855
191856 64. The leonine Hari was denounced by the husband, who was sorely 191857 afflicted at the loss of his consort, to be thus separated from his 191858 wife also.

191860 65. Thus denounced by Bhrigu, by Sanat-kumára, Deva-datta and Vrindá, 191861 he was obliged (to be born in this earth) in the figure of a human being.

66. I have thus explained to you the causes of all the imprecations (which were passed on Vishnu), and will now relate to you all other things which you shall have carefully to attend to.

CHAPTER II.

REASON OF WRITING THE RÁMÁYANA.

SECTION I.

PERSONS ENTITLED TO ITS PERUSAL.

Salutation to the Lord, the universal soul, shining manifest in heaven, earth and the sky, and both within and without myself.

2. One convinced of his constraint (in this mortal world), and desiring his liberation from it, and, who is neither wholly ignorant of, nor quite conversant with divine knowledge, is entitled to (the perusal of) this work.

3. The wise man, who having well considered the narrative (of Ráma) as the first step, comes afterwards to think on the means of liberation (as are expounded herein), he shall verily be exempt from transmigration (of his soul).

4. Know, O destroyer of thy enemies! that I have first embodied the history of Ráma in this Rámáyana (as the preparatory step to salvation).

5. And I have given the same to my attentive pupil the obedient and intelligent Bharadwája, as the sea yields his gems to their seeker.

6. These historical preparatories were rehearsed by the learned Bharadwája in the presence of Brahmá, seated in a certain forest of the Sumeru Mountain.

7. Then the lord Brahmá, the great grandfather of the inhabitants (of the three worlds), was so highly pleased with him that he addressed him saying: "Oh my son! ask the best boon that thou wishest for."

8. Bharadwája said:—"Oh thou lord, that art master of the past and future times, grant me the desired boon of communicating to me the means whereby people are liberated from their miseries."

SECTION II.

BRAHMÁ'S BEHEST.

9. Brahmá said:—"Go ask diligently of thy preceptor Válmiki, to complete the faultless Rámáyana that he has undertaken (to write).

10. "By the hearing of which men will get over their manifold errors, in the same manner as they pass over the sea by the bridge built over it by the great Ráma, who was fraught with all good qualities."

11. Válmiki said:—Saying this to Bharadwája, the supreme maker of all beings (Brahmá) accompanied him to my hermitage.

12. In right earnest was the god welcomed by me with the argha and offerings of water and the like, when the lord of truth spoke to me for the good of all creatures.

13. Brahmá spake to me saying:—"Do not Oh sage! give up your undertaking until its final completion. No pains ought to be spared to make the history of Ráma as faultless as it ought to be.

14. "By this work of yours men will forthwith pass over this hazardous world, in the same manner as one crosses the sea in a vessel."

15. Again said the increate Brahmá to me:—"I come to tell this very thing to you, that you complete the work for the benefit of mankind."

16. Then Oh king, the God disappeared from my sacred hermitage in a moment, just as the wave subsides in the water no sooner it has heaved itself.

17. I was struck with wonder at the disappearance of that (deity), and then being composed in my mind, I inquired of Bharadwája, saying:—

18. Tell me, Bharadwája, what Brahmá spoke (to me) in the hermitage; to which he answered saying:—

19. "The God commanded you to complete the Rámáyana for the good of men, and as a means of their crossing over the gulf of the world."

SECTION III.

INQUIRY OF BHARADWÁJA.

20. "Now Sir", said Bharadwája, "explain to me how the great minded Ráma and Bhárata conducted themselves amidst the troubles of this world.

21. "Tell me also how did Satrughna, Lakshmana, and the renowned Sítá, and all those who followed Ráma, as also the ministers and their highly intelligent sons, conduct themselves (on earth).

22. "Tell me clearly how they escaped all its miseries, that I may do the same with the rest of mankind: (for our salvation)."

23. Being thus respectfully addressed by Bharadwája, I was led, Oh great King! to carry out the behest of my lord (Brahmá), and to narrate the Rámáyana to him; saying:—

24. Hear my son Bharadwája, I will tell you all that you have asked, and by the hearing of which you shall be enabled to cast away the dross of errors (under which you labour).

25. You are wise and have to manage yourself in the manner of the felicitous and lotus-eyed Ráma, with a mind free from (worldly) attachments.

26. (Know that) Lakshmana, Bhárata, the great minded Satrughna, Kausalyá, Sítá, Sumitrá as well as Dasaratha;—

27. With Kritástra and the two friends of Ráma, and Vasishtha and Vámadeva, and the eight ministers of state as well as many others, had reached the summit of knowledge (by this means).

28. Their names are Dhrishta, Jayanta, Bhása, Satya, Vijaya, Vibíshanah, Sushena and Hanumána. And also Indrajíta (who had attained his highest knowledge).

29. These were the eight ministers of Ráma, who are said to have been equally dispassionate in their minds, and content with what was their lot. They were great souls, and free in their lives.

30. Well my son, if you follow the manner in which these men observed sacrificial rites, gave and received their offerings, and how they lived and thought, you are at once freed from the turmoils (of life).

31. One fallen in this boundless ocean of the world, may enjoy (the bliss of) liberation by the magnanimity of his soul. He shall not come across grief or destitution, but remain ever satisfied by being freed from the fever of anxiety.

CHAPTER III.

VÁLMÍKI'S ADMONITION.

SECTION I.

ON TRUE KNOWLEDGE.

Bharadwája said, O Bráhmaṇ! relate to me first about Ráma, and then enlighten me by degrees with the conditions of attaining liberation in this life, that I may be happy for ever.

2. Válmíki replied:—Know, holy Saint! all worldly conceptions to be as erroneous as the various hues that taint the clear firmament. It is better therefore to efface them in oblivion, rather than revive their reminiscence (in repeated states of existence).

3. All visible objects are absolute negation; we have no idea of them save from sensation. Inquire into these apprehensions, and you will never find them as real.

4. It is possible here (on earth) to attain to this knowledge (of worldly vanities) which is fully expounded herein: if you will listen to it attentively, you shall get at the truth and not otherwise.

5. The conception of this world is a mistake, and though we actually see it, it is never in existence. It appears in the same light, O sinless saint, as the variegated colours in the sky.

6. The conviction of the non-existence of the objects of vision, leads to efface their impressions from the mind. Thus perfected, there springs in it the supreme and eternal bliss of self-extinction.

7. Otherwise there is no quietism to be had herein by men like you, rolling in the depths of science for thousands of years and unacquainted with the true knowledge.

8. Complete abandonment of desires, styled as the best state of liberation, is the only pure step towards beatitude.

9. The absence of desires leads to the extinction of mental actions, in the same manner as the absence of cold conduces to the dissolution of small particles of ice.

10. Our desires which uphold our living bodies (and minds), bind us fast as by strings to our bodily prison. These being loosened, the inward soul is liberated (as a bird from its cage).

11. Desires are of two kinds, pure and impure. The impure ones are the cause of transmigration, while the pure ones serve to destroy it.

12. An impure desire is of the form of a mist of ignorance, consisting in the feeling of an obdurate egoism. This is said by the wise to be the cause of birth (transmigration).

13. A pure desire is like a parched seed incapable to bring forth the germ of transmigration, and only supports the present body (in its dry rigidity).

14. The pure desires which are unattended with transmigration, reside in the bodies of living-liberated men, like unmoving wheels (unable to 192069 move them to action).

192071 15. Those that have the pure desires are not liable to transmigration, 192072 and are said to be knowing in all things that ought to be known. These 192073 are called the living-liberated and are of superior intelligence.

192075 16. I will explain to you how the high minded Ráma attained the state
192076 of liberation in life, hear you this that old age and death may not 192077 come upon you.

192081 192082 EARLY HISTORY OF RÁMA.

192084 17. Hear, Oh highly intelligent Bharadawája, the auspicious course and 192085 conduct of Ráma's life: whereby you shall be enabled to understand 192086 everything at all times.

192088 18. The lotus-eyed Ráma after coming out of his school, remained for 192089 many days at home in his diversions, and without anything to fear.

192091 19. In the course of time as he took the reins of the Government, (in 192092 his hand), his people enjoyed all the bliss that absence of grief and 192093 diseases could impart (to them).

192095 20. At one time Ráma's mind virtuous as he was, became anxious to see 192096 the different places of pilgrimage, the cities and hermitages (that lay 192097 about).

192099 21. So Rághava with this view, approached his father's feet, he touched 192100 the nails (of his toes) as a swan lays hold on the buds of lotus.

192102 22. "Oh my father", he said, "my mind is desirous to see the different 192103 places of pilgrimage, temples of gods, forests and abodes (of men).

192105 23. "Grant me my lord this my petition, as there is no petitioner of 192106 thine on earth whom didst thou ever dishonor."

192108 24. Thus solicited (by Ráma), the king consulted with Vasishtha, and 192109 after much reflection granted him the first request he ever made.

192111 25. On a day of lucky stars Ráma set out (on his journey) with his 192112 two brothers (Lakshmana and Satrugna), having his body adorned 192113 with auspicious marks, and (receiving the) benedictions which were 192114 pronounced on him by the priests.

192116 26. Accompanied also by a body of learned Bráhmans whom Vasishtha had 192117 chosen on the occasion, and a select party of his associate princes;

192118
192119 27. He started from home towards his pilgrimage after he received the 192120 benedictions and embraces of his mothers.

192122 28. As he went out of his city, the citizens welcomed him with the 192123 sounds of trumpets, while the bee-like fickle eyes of the city ladies 192124 were fixed upon his lotus like face.

192126 29. He was bestrewn with handfuls of fried paddy thrown over his body 192127 by the beautiful hands of village-women, that made him appear like the 192128 Himálaya covered over with snow.

192130 30. He dismissed the Bráhmans with honor, and went on hearing the 192131 benedictions of the people, and taking a full view of the landscape
192132 around him until he proceeded towards the forest.

192134 31. He went on distributing alms after making his holy ablutions and 192135 performing his devotion and meditation, as he gradually passed the 192136 limits of Kosala after starting from his palace.

SECTION III.

RÁMA'S PILGRIMAGE.

32. He went about seeing the many rivers and their banks, visiting the shrines of gods, sacred forests and deserts far and remote from the resorts of men, as also the hills, seas and their shores.

33. He saw the Mandákiní bright as the moon, the Kálinđi, clear as the lotus, and also the following rivers, Sarasvatí, Satadru, Chandrabhágá and Irávatí.

34. Also Vení, Krishnavení, Nirvindhya, Saraju, Charmanvatí, Vitastá, Vipásá and Báhúdaká.

35. He saw also the (holy places of) Prayága, the Naimisha, the Dharmaranya, Gyá, Varánasí, Srígiri, Kedára and Pushkara.

36. He saw the Mánasa and the northern Mánsaravara lakes, and many fiery lakes and springs, the Báda, the Vindhya range and the sea.

37. He saw the fiery pool of Jwálámukhí, the great shrine of Jagannátha, the fountain of Indradumna and many other reservoirs, rivers and lakes.

38. He visited the shrine of Kártikeya and the Gandak river of Sálagrámas, and also the sixty four shrines sacred to Hari and Hara.

39. He saw various wonders, the coasts of the four seas, the Vindhya range, the groves of Hara, and the boundary hills and level lands.

40. He visited the places of the great Rájarshis and the Brahmarshis, and went wherever there was any auspicious sanctuary of the gods and Bráhmans. 41. Thus they all honouring Ráma, travelled far and wide in company with his two brothers, and traversed all the four quarters on the surface of the earth.

42. Honoured by the gods, Kinnaras and by men, and having seen all the places on earth, the descendant of Raghu returned home, like Siva when he returns to the Sivaloka.

CHAPTER IV.

RÁMA'S RETURN FROM PILGRIMAGE.

Ráma strewn over with handfuls of flowers by the citizens (surrounding him) entered the palace, as when the beauteous Jayanta (son of Indra) enters his celestial abode.

2. On his first arrival he bent himself in reverence before his father, before Vasishtha, before his brothers, his friends, the Bráhmans and the elderly members of the family.

3. Repeatedly embraced as he was by friends, by his father, mothers and by the Bráhmans, the son of Raghu bowed down his head to them with joy.

4. The assembled people after their familiar conversation with Ráma in the palace, strolled about on all sides highly delighted with his speech, resembling the music of a flute.

5. Thus eight days were passed in festive mirth consequent to the arrival of Ráma, and shouts of joy were sent forth by the elated multitude.

192207 6. Thenceforth Rághava continued to dwell happily at home, with 192208 relating to his friends, the different customs and manners of the 192209 countries (he visited) on all sides.
 192211 7. He rose early in the morning and performed his morning service
 192212 according to law. He then visited his father seated as Indra in his 192213 Council.
 192214
 192215 8. He next passed a fourth part of the day in company with Vasishtha 192216 and other sages, and was greatly edified by their conversations which 192217 were full of instruction.
 192218
 192219 9. He used also to go out for sport under orders of his father; and 192220 surrounded by a large number of troops, to forests full of (wild) boars
 192221 and buffaloes.
 192223 10. Then after returning home and performing his bath and other rites 192224 with his friends, he took his meal with them, and passed the night in 192225 company with his beloved companions.
 192226
 192227 11. In these and similar practices did he pass his days with his 192228 brothers at his father's house, after his return from the pilgrimage.
 192229
 192230 12. Oh sinless (Bharadvāja), with his conduct becoming a prince, Rāma 192231 passed his days with giving delight to the good men that surrounded 192232 him, in the manner of the moon that gladdens mankind with his soothing 192233 ambrosial beams.
 192235
 192236
 192237

CHAPTER V.

OF RÁMA'S SELF-DEJECTION AND ITS CAUSE.

192243 Válmiki said:—

 192245 Afterwards Rāma attained the fifteenth year of his age, and so also 192246 Satrugna and Lakshmana who followed Rāma (in birth), attained also the 192247 same age.

192249 2. Bhārata continued to dwell with joy at the house of his maternal 192250 grandfather, and the king (Dasaratha) ruled the whole earth as usual.
 192251

192252 3. The most wise king Dasaratha (now) consulted his ministers day after 192253 day about the marriage of his sons.

192255 4. But as Rāma remained at home since his return from pilgrimage, he 192256 began to decay day by day as the translucent lake in autumn.
 192257

192258 5. His blooming face with its out-stretched eyes, assumed by degrees a 192259 paleness like that of the withering petals of the white lotus beset by 192260 a swarm of bees.

192262 6. He sat silent and motionless in the posture of his folded legs
 192263 (Padmāsana), and remained absorbed in thought with his palm placed 192264 under his cheek and neck.
 192265

192266 7. Being emaciated in person, and growing thoughtful, sad and 192267 distracted in his mind, he remained speechless as a mute picture in 192268 painting.

192270 8. On being repeatedly requested by the anxious inmates of the family
 192271 to perform his daily rites, he discharged them with a melancholy 192272 countenance (literally—with his faded lotus-like face).

192274 9. Seeing the accomplished Rāma—the mine of merits in such a plight, 192275 all his brothers likewise were reduced to the same condition with him.

10. The king of the earth observing all his three sons thus dejected and lean, gave way to anxiety together with all his queens.
11. Dasaratha asked Ráma repeatedly and in a gentle voice (to tell him) what his anxiety was, and what was the cause of his thoughtfulness; but he returned no answer to it.
12. Then being taken up in his father's lap, the lotus-eyed Ráma replied, that he had no anxiety whatever, and held his silence.
13. Afterwards the king Dasaratha asked Vasishtha, the best of speakers and well informed in all matters, as to the cause why Ráma was so sorrowful.
14. The sage Vasishtha thought over the matter (for a while), and then said, "There is Oh king! a cause of Ráma's sadness, but you need not be anxious about it.
15. "Wise men, Oh king! never entertain the fluctuations of anger or grief, or a lengthened delight from frivolous causes, just as the great elements of the world do not change their states (of inertness) unless it were for the sake of (some new) production."

CHAPTER VI.

ADVENT OF VISWÁMITRA TO THE ROYAL COURT.

The king was thrown into sorrow and suspense at these words of the prince of sages (Vasishtha); but kept his silence for sometime, and waited (that time might work a change).

2. (Meanwhile) the queens of the palace, kept themselves watchful of the movements of Ráma with anxious carefulness.

3. At this very time the famous Viswámitra, the great sage came to visit the king of men at Ayodhyá.

4. The intelligent and wise seer had his sacrificial rites disturbed by the Rákshasas, who were deceitfully powerful and giddy with their strength.

5. It was for the security of his sacrifice that the sage waited on the king, because he was unable to accomplish it in peace (by himself).

6. It was also for the purpose of their destruction, that the illustrious Viswámitra, who was the gem of austere devotion had come to the city of Ayodhyá.

7. Desirous of seeing the king, he spoke to the guards at the gate, to report the arrival of Kausika the son of Gádhi to the king with despatch.

8. On hearing these words, the guards were struck with fear in their minds, and ran as they were bid to the palace of the king.

9. Coming to the Royal abode, the door-keepers informed the chief-warder of the arrival of Viswámitra the royal sage.

10. The staff-bearer immediately proceeded to the presence of the king, seated among the princes and chiefs (under him) in the Court house, and gave his report saying:—

11. "Please your majestic, there is waiting at the door a mighty personage of majestic appearance, bright as the morning sun, with his pendant locks of hair (red and ruddy) as sunbeams.

12. "The brilliancy of his person has brightened the place from the top-most flag down to the ground, and made the horses, men and armory shine as with a golden hue."

13. No sooner had the warder appeared (before the king), and with hurried words announced the arrival of the sage Viswámitra:

14. Then the best of kings as he heard the herald say so, rose at once from his throne of gold with all the ministers and chiefs that surrounded him.

15. He walked immediately on foot with the staff of princes and chiefs by whom he was held in honour and regard, and in company with Vasishtha and Vámadeva.

16. He went to the spot where the great sage was waiting, and saw Viswámitra the chief of sages standing at the gateway.

17. His priestly prowess joined with his military valour, made him appear as the sun descended on earth on some account.

18. He was hoary with old age, rough-skinned by the practice of austerities, and covered down to his shoulders by red-bright braids of hair, resembling the evening clouds over topping a mountain brow.

19. He was mild looking and engaging in his appearance, but at the same time as brilliant as the orb of the sun. He was neither assuming nor repulsive, but possessed of an ineffable gravity and majesty in his person.

20. He was attractive yet formidable (in his look), clear yet vast (in his mind), deep and full (in knowledge), and shining (with his inward light).

21. His life time had no limit, nor his mind any bound to it, nor had age impaired his understanding. He held the ascetics pot in one hand, that went (through life) as his only faithful companion.

22. The compassionateness of his mind, added to the sweet complacency of his speech and looks, pleased the people as if they were actually served with nectar drops, or sprinkled over with ambrosial dews.

23. His body decorated by the sacred thread, and his white prominent eyebrows, made him appear as a wonder to the eyes of his beholders.

24. On seeing the sage, the lord of earth lowly bent himself at a distance, and then bowed down to him (so low), that the ground was decorated by the gems pendant upon his crown.

25. The sage also in his turn greeted the Lord of the earth on the spot with sweet and kind words, like the sun greeting the lord of the gods.

26. Afterwards the assembled Bráhmans (of the court) headed by Vasishtha, honoured him with their welcomes.

27. The king said:—We are as highly favoured, Oh holy sage! by thine unexpected appearance and thy glorious sight, as a bed of lotuses at the sight of the luminous sun.

28. Oh sage, I have felt at thine appearance the happiness which knows no bounds, and which has no diminution in it.

29. This day we must be placed at the front rank of the fortunate, as we have become the object of thine advent.

30. With these and similar conversations that went on among the princes and the sages, they proceeded to the court-hall where they took their 192414      respective seats.

192416      31. The king finding the best of sages (Viswámitra) so very prosperous
192417      in his devotion, felt some hesitation to offer him the _arghya_
192418      (honorarium) himself with his cheerful countenance.

192420      32. He (the sage) accepted the _arghya_ offered him by the king, and 192421      hailed him during his act of turning round (the sage), according to the 192422      rules of Sástra.

192424      33. Thus honoured by the king, he with a cheerful countenance asked 192425      the Lord of men about the good health (of himself and family), and the 192426      fulness of his finance.

192428      34. Then coming in contact with Vasishtha, the great sage saluted him 192429      as he deserved with a smile, and asked him about his health (and of 192430      those in his hermitage).

192432      35. After their interview and exchange of due courtesies had lasted 192433      for a while to the satisfaction of all in the royal assembly;

192435      36. They both took their respective seats; when every one (in the 192436      court) respectfully greeted the sage of exalted prowess.

192438      37. After the sapient sage (Viswámitra) was seated, they made various 192439      offerings of _pádyā_, _arghya_ and kine to him.

192441      38. Having honoured Viswámitra in due form, the lord of men
192442      condescended to address him with a gladdest mind and in submissive 192443      terms, with his palms folded over each other.

192444 192445 192446                      SECTION II.

192447 192448                      ADDRESS OF KING DASARATHA.

192450      39. He said, "Sir, your coming here is as grateful to me as the 192451      obtaining of nectar by one, as a rainfall after a drought, and as the 192452      gaining of sight by the blind."

192454      40. Again it is as delightful to me as the getting of a son by a 192455      childless man in his beloved wife, and coming in possession of a 192456      treasure in a dream.

192458      41. Your advent is no less pleasing to me than one's meeting with the 192459      object of his wishes, the arrival of a friend, and the recovery of 192460      thing that was given for lost.

192462      42. It gives me the joy that is derived from the sight of a deceased
192463      friend suddenly returning by the way of the sky. It is thus Oh Bráhmaṇ, 192464      I welcome your visit to me.

192466      43. Who is there that is not glad to live in the heaven (Brahma-loka)?
192467      I feel myself as happy Oh sage! at your advent, and this I tell you 192468      truly.

192470      44. (Now tell me) what is your best pleasure, and what I may do for 192471      you; O Vipra, that are the best of the virtuous, and most properly 192472      deserving of my services.

192474      45. Formerly had you been famed under the title of Rájarshi (or royal 192475      sage); but since, made glorious by dint of your asceticism, you have 192476      been promoted to the rank of a Brahmarshi (or Brahman sage). Wherefore 192477      you are truly the object of my worship.

192479      46. I am so glad at your sight that it soothes my inmost soul, in the 192480      same manner as an ablution in Gangá's stream cheers the mind.

192482      47. Free as you are from fears and desires, from wrath and passions and the feelings of pleasure, pain and disease, it is very wonderful, Oh Bráhma, that you should have recourse to me (for anything).

48. I consider myself as situated at a holy sanctuary, and absolved from all my sins, or as merged in the lunar sphere (by your presence), Oh! best of the learned in the truths of the Vedas.

49. I understand your appearance as that of Brahmá himself before me, and I confess myself, O sage! to be purified and favoured by your advent.

50. I am indeed so gratified at your arrival, that I deem myself fortunate in this birth, and that I have not lived in vain but led a truly good life.

51. My heart cannot contain within itself, but overflows (with joy) like the sea at the sight of the moon, since I beheld your person here and made my respectful obeisance to you.

52. Whatever is your commission, and whatsoever may be the object, O greatest of sages! which has brought you hither, know it as already granted (by me); for your commands are always to be obeyed by me.

53. You need not hesitate to communicate to me your hest, O progeny of Kausika, there is nothing, with me which is to be kept from you, if you should ask for it.

54. You need not dubitate about my performance of the act. I tell it solemnly that I will execute your behest to the last item, as I take you in the light of a superior divinity.

55. Upon hearing these sweet words (of the king), which were pleasing to the ears, and delivered with a humility worthy of one knowing himself, the far famed and meritorious chief of the sages felt highly gratified in himself.

CHAPTER VII.

VISWÁMITRA'S REQUEST FOR RÁMA.

After the illustrious Viswámitra had heard the aforesaid unusually lengthy speech of the lion among kings, his hairs stood erect with joy, and he said (in reply).

2. This speech is worthy of thee, O best of kings on earth, and one descended from a royal race, and guided by the sage Vasishtha himself.

3. Consider well O king about the performance of the act which I have in mind, and support (the cause of) virtue.

4. I am employed, O chief of men, in religious acts for attainment of my consummation, whereto the horrible Rákshasas have become my great obstructions.

5. Whenever I betake myself to offer sacrifices (to the gods) at any place, instantly do these nocturnal demons appear to destroy my sacrificial rites.

6. The chiefs of the Rákshasas fling heaps of flesh and blood on the sacrificial ground (before me), on very many occasions that I commence my ceremonies.

7. Being thus obstructed in my sacrificial duties, I now come to thee from that spot and with a broken spirit, after having laboured in vain (for completion of the rites).

8. I have no mind O king, to give vent to my anger by imprecations, which have no room in my conduct (of religious life).
9. Such being the sacrificial law, I expect to gain its great object in peace by thy favor.
10. Being thus oppressed I have recourse to thy protection, and thou shouldst protect me (from wrongs); otherwise it is an insult to solicitors to be put to disappointment by the best of men (as thyself).
11. Thou hast a son, the beauteous Ráma, powerful as the fierce tiger, and strong as the great Indra himself. He it is who is able to destroy the Rákshasas.
12. Now mayst thou deliver to me that Ráma thy eldest son, having his youthful locks of hair like the sable plumage of a crow, but possessing the true valour of a hero.
13. Protected under my sacred authority, he will be able by his personal prowess, to sever the heads of the malicious Rákshasas.
14. I will do him an infinity of good services, whereby he will in the end become adored by the inhabitants of the three worlds.
15. The night-wandering Rákshasas cannot abide in the field before Ráma, but must fly like stags in the wilderness before the furious lion.
16. No other man than Ráma can make bold to fight with the Rákshasas; as no animal other than the furious lion can stand to fight with the wild elephants.
17. Elated with their strength these vicious beings have become (as deadly) as poisoned shafts in fighting, and being delegates of Khara and Dushana, they are as furious as death itself.
18. They cannot, Oh thou tiger among kings! be able to sustain the arrows of Ráma, but must set down like the flying dust under the ceaseless showers of his arrows.
19. Let not paternal affection prevail over thee O king (to withhold thy son), as there is nothing in this world, which the high-minded will refuse to part with (to their suitor).
20. I know it for certain, and so shouldst thou know also, that the Rákshasas must be destroyed by him; and (believe me) that wise men like ourselves will never undertake to engage in an uncertainty.
21. I well know the great soul of the lotus-eyed Ráma, and so does the illustrious Vasishtha, and all other far-seeing (sages and seers).
22. Should the sense of greatness, duty and renown, have a seat in thy soul, thou shouldst deliver my desired object—thy son to me.
23. It will take me ten nights to perform the rites of my sacrifice, at which Ráma shall have to stay with me and kill the Rákshasas, who are obnoxious to my rites and enemies of the sacrifice.
24. Let the ministers, Oh Kákutstha! headed by Vasishtha join to give their assent (to it), and deliver thy Ráma to me.
25. Thou O son of Raghu, that knowest the times (of religious observances) must not allow my time to slip, so do as I may have Ráma. Be blest and give not way to sorrow.
26. Even the smallest service appears to be much if done in good time, and the best service is of no avail if done out of season.
27. The illustrious and holy chief of the sages Viswámitra, paused 192621 after saying these words fraught with a virtuous and useful intention.

192623 28. Hearing these words of the great sage, the magnanimous king held 192624 his silence for some time, with a view to prepare a fitting answer;
192625 because no man of sense is ever satisfied with talking unreasonably 192626 either before others or to himself.

192633 DASARATHA'S REPLY TO VISWÁMITRA.

192636 Válmíki added:—On hearing these words of Viswámitra, the tiger among 192637 kings remained speechless for a moment, and then besought him in the 192638 lowliness of his spirit.

192640 2. Ráma my lotus-eyed boy is only of fifteen years of age. I do not see 192641 he is a match for the Rákshasas.

192643 3. Here is a full _akshauhini_ legion of my soldiers; of whom, Oh my 192644 Lord! I am the sole commander; surrounded by them I will offer battle 192645 to the Rákshasas cannibals.

192647 4. Here are my brave generals who are well disciplined in warfare; I 192648 will be their leader in the height of war with my bow in hand.

192650 5. Accompanied with these, I can offer fight to the enemies of the 192651 gods, and to the great Indra himself, in the same manner as the lion 192652 withstands the wild elephants.

192654 6. Ráma is but a boy who has no knowledge of the strength of our 192655 forces, and whose experience has scarcely stretched to the battle field 192656 beyond the inner apartments (of the house).

192658 7. He is not well trained in arms, nor is he skilled in warfare. He 192659 does not know to fight with a foe, arrayed in the order of battle.

192661 8. He only knows how to walk about in the gardens of this city and 192662 amidst the arbours and pleasant groves.

192664 9. He only knows how to play with his brother princes, in the flowery 192665 parks set apart for his play within the precincts of the palace.

192667 10. Nowadays, Oh Bráhmaṇ! he has become by a sad reverse of my fortune, 192668 as lean and pale as the withering lotus under the dews.

192670 11. He has no taste for his food, nor can he walk from one room to 192671 another, but remains ever silent and slow brooding over his inward 192672 grief and melancholy.

192674 12. In my great anxiety about him, O chief of sages, I have been, with 192675 my family and dependants, deprived of the gist of our bodies, and 192676 become as empty clouds of autumn.

192678 13. Can my boy, so young as he is, and thus subjected to distemper, be 192679 fit to fight at all, and again with those marauders who rove about at 192680 nights.

192682 14. Oh thou high-minded sage! it is one's affection for his son that 192683 affords him far greater pleasure than his possession of a kingdom, or 192684 his connection with beauteous females, or even his relish for the juice
192685 of nectar.

192687 15. It is from paternal affection that good people (engage to) perform 192688 the hardest duties and austerities of religion, and any thing which is 192689 painfull in the three worlds.

16. Men are even prepared under certain circumstances to sacrifice their own lives, riches and wives; but they can never sacrifice their children: this is the nature with all living beings.

17. The Rákshasas are very cruel in their actions and fight deceitful warfares: so that Ráma should fight them, is an idea which is very painful to me.

18. I that have a desire to live, cannot dare to live for a moment in separation from Ráma; therefore thou shouldst not take him away (from me).

19. I have O Kausika! passed nine thousand rains in my lifetime, ere these four boys were born to me after much austerity.

20. The lotus-eyed Ráma is the eldest of these without whom the three others can hardly bear to live.

21. This Ráma is going to be conveyed by thee against the Rákshasas; but when I am deprived of that son, know me certainly for dead.

22. Of my four sons he is the one in whom rests my greatest love. Therefore do not take away Ráma—my eldest and most virtuous son from me.

23. If thy intention Oh sage, is to destroy the force of night wanderers, take me there accompanied by the four kinds (elephants, horse, chariots and foot soldiers) of mine army.

24. Describe to me clearly what these Rákshasas are, how strong they are, whose sons they be and what their size and figure.

25. Tell me the way in which the Rákshasas are to be destroyed by Ráma or my boys or by myself, when they are known to be treacherous in warfare.

26. Tell me all these, Oh great sage! that I can calculate the possibility of our making a stand against the fiercely disposed Rákshasas in the open field, when they are certainly so very powerful.

27. The Rákshasa named Rávana is heard as being very powerful, he is brother of Kubera himself, and is the son of the sage Visravas.

28. If it is he, the evil minded Rávana, that stands in the way of thy rites, we are unable to contend with that pest.

29. Power and prosperity in all their flourish come within the reach of the living at times, but they disappear at others.

30. Nowadays we are no match for such foes as Rávana and some others. Such is the decree of destiny.

31. Therefore, O thou, that art acquainted with law, do this favour to my son (as not to take him away); unlucky as I am, it is thou that art the arbiter of my fate.

32. The gods, and Asuras, the Gandharvas and Yakshas, the huge beasts, birds and serpents are unable to fight with Rávana: what are we human beings in arms to him.

33. That Rákshasa holds the prowess of the most powerful, we cannot afford to fight with him, nor even with his children.

34. This is a peculiar age in which good people are made powerless; I am moreover disabled by old age and want that spirit (that I was expected to possess) derived as I am from (the most powerful) race of the Raghus.

192759 35. Tell me O Bráhmāna! if it is Lavan the son of Madhu (the notorious 192760 Asúra) that disturbs the sacrificial rites; in that case also I will 192761 not part with my son.

192763 36. If it be the two sons of Sunda and Upasunda terrible as they are 192764 like the sons of the sun, that disturb your sacrifice, in that case
192765 also I will not give my son to thee.

192767 37. But after all, O Bráhman, shouldest thou snatch him from me (by 192768 dint of the supernatural power that thou possessest), then I am also 192769 dead and gone with him. I do not see any other chance of a lasting 192770 success of thy devotion (except by my death).

192772 38. Saying these gentle words, the descendant of Raghu was drowned in 192773 the sea of suspense with regard to the demand of the sage, but being 192774 unable to arrive at a conclusion, the great king was carried away by 192775 the current of his thoughts as one by the high waves of the sea.

192776 192777 192778 192779 192780 CHAPTER IX.

192781 192782 VISWÁMITRA'S WRATH. AND HIS ENRAGED SPEECH.

192784
192785 Válmiki said:—On hearing this speech of the king with his piteous look 192786 and eyes full of tears, the son of Kausika became highly incensed and 192787 replied.

192789 2. Thou art about to break thy promise after pledging thyself to its 192790 performance, and thus wishest to behave as a deer after having been a 192791 lion (before).

192793 3. This is unbecoming of the race of Raghu, it is acting contrary (to 192794 the rules) of this great family. Hot rays must not proceed from the 192795 cool beamed moon.

192797 4. If thou art so impotent Oh king! let me return as I came. Thou 192798 promise-breaking Kákustha live happily with thy friends.

192800 5. As the high spirited Viswámitra now moved with ire, the earth 192801 trembled under him, and the gods were filled with fear.

192803 6. Vasishtha the meek and wise and observant of his vows, perceiving 192804 the great sage and friend of the world thus influenced by ire, gave 192805 vent to his speech (as follows).

192807 7. Oh king that art born of the race of the Ikshákus, and art a form of 192808 virtue itself, and called Dasaratha the fortunate, and art adorned with 192809 all the good qualities known in the three worlds.

192811 8. Being famed for thy meekness and strictness to thy vows, and 192812 renowned in all three worlds for thy virtues and fame, thou canst not 192813 break thy plighted faith.

192815 9. Preserve thy virtue and think not to break thy faith, comply with 192816 the request of the sage who is honoured in all the three worlds.

192818 10. Saying, thou wilt do it, if thou retract thy promise, thou lovest
192819 the object of thy yet unfulfilled desires. Therefore part with Ráma 192820 from thee.

192822 11. Descended from the race of Ikshaku, and being Dasaratha thyself, 192823 if thou failest to perform thy promise, who else on earth will ever 192824 keep his word?

192826 12. It is in pursuance of the conduct of great men like thee, that low 192827 people even do not dare to transgress the bounds of their duty, how 192828 then dost thou wish to violate it thyself.

192830 13. Guarded by this lion-like man (Viswámitra) in the manner of 192831 ambrosia by fire, no Rákshasa will have power to prevail over Ráma, 192832 whether he be accoutered and armed or not.

192834 14. Behold him here as the personification of virtue, the mightiest of 192835 the mighty, and superior to all in the world in his intelligence, and 192836 devotedness to asceticism.

192838 15. He is skilled in all warlike arms that are known in the three 192839 worlds, no other man knows them so well nor shall ever be able to 192840 master them like him.

192842 16. Among the Gods, the Sages, the Asuras, the Rákshasas, the Nágas, 192843 the Yakshas and Gandharvas, there is none equal to him (in might).

192845 17. In bygone days when this son of Kaushika used to rule over his 192846 realm, he was furnished with all the arms by Krisáswa, and which no
192847 enemy can baffle.

192849 18. These arms were the progeny of Krisáswa, and were equally radiant 192850 and powerful as the progeny of the Prajapati, and followed him (in his 192851 train).

192853 19. Now Daksha (the patriarch) had two beauteous daughters Jayá 192854 and Suprajá (alias Vijayá), who had a hundred offspring (as 192855 personifications of the implements), that are invincible in war.

192857 20. Of these the favoured Jayá has given birth to fifty sons of old, 192858 who are implacable agents of the destruction of Asúra forces.

192860 21. In like manner, Suprajá gave birth to fifty sons of very superior 192861 qualities, who are very powerful and terrible in their appearance, and 192862 indomitably aggressive.

192864 22. Thus Viswámitra is strengthened and grown powerful (by means 192865 of these). He is acknowledged as a sage in the three worlds, Thou 192866 therefore must not think otherwise than deliver Ráma to him.

192867
192868 23. This mighty and virtuous man and prince of sages being nigh, any 192869 one even at the point of death in his presence, is sure to attain 192870 his immortality (on earth): therefore be not disheartened like an 192871 insensible man.

192877 192878 MELANCHOLY OF RÁMA.

192880
192881 Válmiki related:—After Vasishtha had done saying in this manner, king
192882 Dasaratha was glad to send for Ráma with Lakshmana, and said:

192883
192884 2. Go you chamberlain, and bring here quickly the truly mighty and long 192885 armed Ráma with Lakshmana, for the meritorious purpose of removing the 192886 impediments (in the way of religious acts).

192888 3. Thus sent by the king he went to the inner apartment, and coming 192889 back in a moment informed the king.

192891 4. Oh sire! Ráma, whose arms have crushed all his foes, remains rapt in 192892 thoughts in his room like the bee closed in the lotus at night.

192894 5. He said, he is coming in a moment, but is so abstracted in his 192895 lonely meditation that he likes no body to be near him.
192896

192897 6. Thus acquainted by the chamberlain, the king called one of the 192898 attendants of Ráma to him, and having given him every assurance, asked 192899 him to relate the particulars.

192901 7. On being asked by the king how Ráma had come to that state, the 192902 attendant thus replied to him in a sorrowful mood.

192904 8. Sir, we have also become as lean as sticks in our persons, in sorrow
192905 for the fading away of your son Ráma in his body.

192907 9. The lotus-eyed Ráma appears dejected ever since he has come back 192908 from his pilgrimage in company with the Bráhmanas.

192910 10. When besought by us with importunity to perform his daily rites, 192911 he sometimes discharges them with a placid countenance, and wholly 192912 dispenses with them at others.

192914 11. He is averse, Oh Lord! to bathing, to worshipping the gods, to the 192915 distribution of alms, and to his meals also; and even when importuned 192916 by us he does not take his food with a good relish.

192918 12. He no longer suffers himself to be rocked in the swinging cradles 192919 by the playful girls of the harem, nor does he divert himself under the 192920 showering fountains like the _chátaka_ (in rain water).

192922 13. No ornaments beset with the bud-shaped rubies, no bracelets nor 192923 necklace, Oh king, can please him now, in the same manner as nothing in 192924 heaven can please its inhabitants who expect their fall from it (after 192925 the expiration of their terms).

192927 14. He is sorrowful even while sitting in the arbours of creepers, 192928 regaled by flowery breezes, and amidst the looks of damsels playing 192929 around him.

192931 15. Whatever thing Oh king! is good and sweet, elegant and pleasing, to 192932 the soul, he looks at them with sorrowful eyes, like one whose eyes are 192933 already satiate with viewing them heaped up in piles (before him).

192935 16. He would speak ill of the girls that would dance merrily before 192936 him, and exclaim out saying, "why should these ladies of the harem 192937 flutter about in this way causing grief in me."

192939 17. His doings are like those of a madman, who takes no delight at his 192940 food or rest, his vehicles or seats, his baths and other pleasures, 192941 however excellent they be.

192942 192943 18. As regards prosperity or adversity, his habitation or any other 192944 desirable things, he says of them to be all unreal, and then holds his 192945 silence.

192947 19. He cannot be excited to pleasantries nor tempted to taste of 192948 pleasures; he attends to no business, but remains in silence.

192950 20. No woman with her loosened locks and tresses, and the negligent 192951 glances of her eyes, can please him any more than the playful fawn can 192952 please the trees in the forest.

192954 21. Like a man sold among savages, he takes delight in lonely places, 192955 in remotest skirts, in the banks (of rivers) and wild deserts.

192957 22. His aversion to clothing and conveyance, food and presents, 192958 bespeaks O king! that he is following the line of life led by wandering 192959 ascetics.

192961 23. He lives alone, Oh lord of men! in a lonely place, and neither 192962 laughs nor sings nor cries aloud from a sense of their indifference to 192963 him.

192965 24. Seated in the posture of folded legs (Padmāsana), he stays with a distracted mind, reclining his cheek on his left palm.

25. He assumes no pride to himself nor wishes for the dignity of sovereignty; he is neither elated with joy nor depressed by grief or pain.

26. We do not know where he goes, what he does, what he desires, what he meditates upon, whence and when he comes and what he follows.

27. He is getting lean every day, growing pale day by day, and like a tree at the end of autumn, he is becoming discoloured day after day.

28. Satrugghna and Lakshmana are, Oh king! the followers of all his habits, and resemble his very shadows.

29. Being repeatedly asked by his servants, his brother-princes and his mothers (as to the cause of his dementedness), he says he has none, and then resumes his taciturnity and indifference.

30. He would lecture his companions and friends saying, "do not set your mind to sensual enjoyments which are only pleasing for the time being."

31. He has no affection for the richly adorned women of the harem, but rather looks upon them as the cause of destruction presented before him.

32. He often chaunts in plaintive notes, how his life is being spent in vain cares, estranged from those of the easily attainable state of (heavenly bliss).

33. Should some dependant courtier speak of his being an emperor (one day), he smiles at him as upon a raving madman, and then remains silent as one distracted in his mind.

34. He does not pay heed to what is said to him, nor does he look at any thing presented before him. He hates to look upon things even the most charming (to sight).

35. As it is chimerical to suppose the existence of an etherial lake, and lotus growing in the same, so it is false to believe the reality of the mind and its conceptions. Saying so Ráma marvels at nothing.

36. Even when sitting amidst beauteous maids, the darts of Cupid fail to pierce his impenetrable heart, as showers of rain the (unimpregnable) rock.

37. That "no sensible man should ever wish for riches which are but the seats of dangers"; making this his motto, Ráma gives away all that he has to beggars.

38. He sings some verses to this effect that "it is an error to call one thing as prosperity and the other adversity, when they are both but imaginations of the mind".

39. He repeats some words to this purport that, "though it is the general cry, "O I am gone, I am helpless grown," yet it is a wonder, that no body should betake himself to utter indifference."

40. That Ráma, the destroyer of enemies, the great Sála (oak) that is grown in the garden of Raghu, should get into such a state of mind is what causes grief in us.

41. We do not know, Oh great armed and lotus-eyed king! what to do with him in this state of his mind. We hope only in thee.

42. He laughs to scorn the counsels of the princes and Bráhmans before him, and spurns them as if they were fools.

43. He remains inactive with the conviction, that the world which appears to our view is a vanity, and the idea of self is also a vanity.

44. He has no respect for foes or friends, for himself or his kingdom, mother or riches, nor does he pay any regard to prosperity or adversity.

45. He is altogether quiescent, without any desire or effort, and devoid of a mainstay; he is neither captivated by any thing nor freed from worldly thoughts. These are the reasons which afflict us most.

46. He says, "what have we to do with riches, with our mothers, with this kingdom and all our activities." Under these impressions, he is about to give up his life.

47. As the chátaka (swallow) grows restless at the obstruction of rains (by hurricanes), so has Ráma become impatient (under the restraint) of his father and mother, his friends and kingdom, his enjoyments and even his own life.

48. Now in compassion on thy son, incline to root out this chagrin which like a noxious creeper has been spreading its branches (in his mind).

49. For notwithstanding his possession of all affluence, he looks upon the enjoyments of the world as his poison under such a disposition of his mind.

50. Where is that potent person in this earth, who can restore him to proper conduct (as by a potent medicine?).

51. Who is there, that like the sun removing the darkness of the world by his rays, will remove the errors that have been the cause of grief in Ráma's mind, and thereby make his generosity effectual in his case.

CHAPTER XI.

CONSOLATION OF RÁMA.

Viswámitra said:—If such is the case, you who are intelligent, may go at once, and persuade that progeny of Raghu to come hither; as they do one deer by others (of the train).

2. This stupor of Ráma is not caused by any (external) accident or (inward) affection; it is I think the development of that superior intellect which rises from the right reasoning of dispassionate men.

3. Let Ráma come here for a while, and here shall we in a moment dispel the delusion (of his mind), as the wind drives away the clouds from the mountain-tops.

4. After his hebetude is removed by my reasoning, he shall be enabled to repose in that happy state of mind, to which we have arrived.

5. He shall not only attain to pure truth and a clear understanding of uninterrupted tranquility, but secure to himself a plumpness and beauteousness of his figure and complexion, as one derives from a potion of ambrosia.

6. He will then attend with all his heart to the full discharge of the proper course of his duties without remission, which will redound to his honour.

7. He will become strong with a knowledge of both worlds, and his exemption from the states of pleasure and pain, and then he will look upon gold and stones with an indifferent eye.

8. After the chief of the sages had spoken in this manner, the king resumed the firmness of his mind, and sent heralds after heralds to bring Ráma to him.

9. By this very time Ráma was preparing to rise from his seat in the palace to come over to his father, in the manner that the sun rises from the mountain in the east.

10. Surrounded by a few of his servants, he came with his two brothers to the hallowed hall of his father, resembling the heaven of the king of gods.

11. He saw at a distance his kingly sire seated amidst the assemblage of princes, as Indra surrounded by the gods.

12. He was accompanied on either side by the sages Vasishtha and Viswámitra, and respectfully attended by his staff of ministers, all well versed in the interpretation of all Sástras.

13. He was fanned by charming damsels, waving the fine chauri flappers in their hands, and equalling in beauty the goddesses presiding over the quarters of heaven.

14. Vasishtha, Viswámitra and the other sages, with Dasaratha and his chiefs, saw Ráma coming at a distance as beautiful as Skanda himself.

15. He appeared by his qualities of mildness and gravity to resemble the mount Himálaya (with his cooling frost and firmness), and was esteemed by all for the depth and clearness (of his understanding).

16. He was handsome and well proportioned (in his features), auspicious in his look, but humble and magnanimous in his mind. With loveliness and mildness of his person, he was possessed of all manly prowess.

17. He was just developed to youth, yet he was as majestic as an elderly man. He was neither morose nor merry, but seemed to be fully satisfied with himself, as if he had obtained all the objects of his desire.

18. He was a good judge of the world, and possessed of all holy virtues. The purity of his mind was the attraction for all the virtues which met in him.

19. The receptacle of his mind was filled by his magnanimity and honourable virtues, and the candour of his conduct showed him in the light of perfection (to every body).

20. Endowed with these various virtues and decorated by his necklace and fine apparel, Ráma the support of Raghu's race, approached (his father) with a smiling countenance.

21. He bowed his head to his father with the sparkling gems trembling in his locks, and imparting to his head the graceful appearance of the mountain Sumeru shaken by an earth-quake.

22. The lotus-eyed Ráma came up to salute the feet of his father, when the lord of the sages (Viswámitra) was speaking with him.

23. First of all Ráma saluted his father, and then the two honorable sages, he next saluted the Bráhmanas, and then his relations, and lastly his elders and well wishing friends.

24. He then received and returned the salutations of the chiefs and princes, bowing to him with graceful motion of their heads and respectful addresses.

25. Ráma of god-like beauty and equanimity of mind, approached the sacred presence of his father, with the blessings of the two sages.

193173 26. During the act of his saluting the feet of his father, the lord of 193174 the earth repeatedly kissed his head and face, and embraced him with 193175 fondness.

193177 27. At the same time, he the destroyer of his enemies, embraced
193178 Lakshmana and Satrughna, with as intense an affection as the swan 193179 embracing the lotus flowers.

193181 28. "Be you seated my son upon my lap", said the king to Ráma, who 193182 however, took his seat on a fine piece of cloth spread on the floor by 193183 his servants.

193185 29. The king said "O my son and receptacle of blessings, you have 193186 attained the age of discretion, so put not yourself to that state
193187 of self-mortification, as the dull-headed do from their crazy
193188 understandings.

193190 30. "Know that it is by following the course of his elders, guides 193191 and Bráhmanas, that one attains to meritoriousness, and not by his 193192 persistence in error.

193194 31. "So long will the train of our misfortunes lie at a distance, as we 193195 do not allow the seeds of error to have access to us."

193197 32. Vasishtha said, Oh strong armed prince! you are truly heroic to 193198 have conquered your worldly appetites, which are at once as difficult 193199 to be eradicated as they are fierce in their action.

193201 33. Why do you allow yourself like the unlearned, to be drowned in this 193202 rolling sea of errors, causing such dull inactivity in you?

193204 34. Viswámitra said "why are your eyes so unsteady (with doubts) as 193205 the tremulous clusters of blue lotuses. You ought to do away with this 193206 unsteadiness, and tell us what is that grief (which rankles) in your 193207 mind.

193209 35. "What are these thoughts, and what are their names and natures, 193210 their number and causes, that infest your mind like its maladies (in 193211 the same manner) as the mice undermine a fabric."

193213 36. I am disposed to think, that you are not the person to be troubled 193214 with those evils and distempers, to which the base and vile alone are 193215 subject.

193217 37. Tell me the craving of your heart, O sinless Ráma! and they will be 193218 requited in a manner, as will prevent their recurrence to you.

193220 38. Ráma—the standard of Raghu's race having listened to the 193221 reasonable and graceful speech of the good-intentioned sage, shook off
193222 his sorrowing, like the peacock at the roaring of a cloud, in the hope 193223 of gaining his object.

193224 193225 193226 193227 193228 CHAPTER XII.

193229 193230 RÁMA'S REPLY.

193232
193233 Válmíki related:—Being thus asked with soothing words by the chief of 193234 the sages, Ráma made his answer in a soft and graceful speech replete 193235 with good sense.

193237 2. Ráma said, Oh venerable sage! I will tell thee in truth, untutored 193238 though I am, all the particulars as asked by thee; for who would 193239 disobey the bidding of the wise?

193241 3. Since I was born in this mansion of my father I have all along 193242 remained, grown up and received my education (in this very place).

193244 4. Then O leader of sages! being desirous to learn good usages (of 193245 mankind), I set out to travel to holy places all over this sea-girt 193246 earth.

193248 5. It was by this time that there arose a train of reflections in my 193249 mind of the following nature which shook my confidence in worldly 193250 objects.

193252 6. My mind was employed in the discrimination of the nature of things 193253 which led me gradually to discard all thoughts of sensual enjoyments.

193255 7. What are these worldly pleasures good for, (thought I), and what 193256 means the multiplication (of our species) on earth? Men are born to 193257 die, and they die to be born again.

193259 8. There is no stability in the tendencies of beings whether movable 193260 or immovable. They all tend to vice, decay and danger; and all our 193261 possessions are the grounds of our penury.

193262
193263 9. All objects (of sense) are detached from each other as iron rods or 193264 needles from one another; it is imagination alone which attaches them
193265 to our minds.

193267 10. It is the mind that pictures the existence of the world as a 193268 reality, but the deceptiveness of the mind (being known) we are safe 193269 from such deception.

193271 11. If the world is an unreality, it is  pity that ignorant men
193272 should be allured by it, like the deer tempted by a distant mirage
193273 (appearing) as water.

193275 12. We are sold by none (to any one) and yet we remain as if enslaved
193276 to the world; and knowing this well, we are spellbound to riches, as it
193277 were by the magic wand of Sambara.

193279 13. What are the enjoyments in this quintessence (of the world) but 193280 misery; and yet we are foolishly caught in its thoughts, as if clogged
193281 in honey (like bees).

193283 14. Ah! I perceive after long that we have insensibly fallen into 193284 errors, like senseless stags falling into caverns in the wilderness.

193286 15. Of what use is royalty and these enjoyments to me? What am I and 193287 whence are all these things? They are but vanities, and let them 193288 continue as such without any good or loss to any body.

193289
193290 16. Reasoning in this manner Oh Bráhmaṇ, I came to be disgusted with 193291 the world, like a traveller in (his journey through) a desert.

193293 17. Now tell me, O venerable sir! whether this world is advancing to 193294 its dissolution, or continued reproduction, or is it in course of its 193295 endless progression.

193297 18. If there is any progress here, it is that of the appearance and 193298 disappearance of old age and decease, of prosperity and adversity by 193299 turns.

193301 19. Behold how the variety of our trifling enjoyments hastens our 193302 decay, they are like hurricanes shattering the mountain trees.

193303
193304 20. Men continue in vain to breathe their vital breath as hollow-bamboo 193305 wind-pipes having no sense.

193307 21. How is (human) misery to be alleviated, is the (only) thought that 193308 consumes me like wild fire in the hollow of a withered tree.

193310 22. The weight of worldly miseries sits heavy on my heart as a rock,

193311 and obstructs my lungs to breathe out. I have a mind to weep, but am 193312 prevented from shedding my tears for fear of my people.
193313
193314 23. My tearless weeping and speechless mouth, give no indication of my 193315 inward sorrow to any body, except my consciousness the silent witness 193316 in my solitude.
193318 24. I wait to think on the positive and negative states (of worldly 193319 bliss), as a ruined man bewails to reflect on his former state of 193320 affluence (and present indigence).
193321
193322 25. I take prosperity to be a seducing cheat, for its deluding the 193323 mind, impairing the good qualities (of men), and spreading the net of 193324 our miseries.
193326 26. To me, like one fallen into great difficulties, no riches, 193327 offspring, consorts or home afford any delight, but they seem to be (so 193328 many sources of) misery.
193329
193330 27. I, like a wild elephant in chains, find no rest in my mind, by 193331 reflecting on the various evils of the world, and by thinking on the 193332 causes of our frailties.
193333
193334 28. There are wicked passions prying at all times, under the dark mist 193335 of the night of our ignorance; and there are hundreds of objects, which 193336 like so many cunning rogues, are about all men in broad day-light, and 193337 lurking on all sides to rob us of our reason. What mighty champions can 193338 we delegate (now) to fight with these than our knowledge of truth?
193339
193340
193341
193342

193343 CHAPTER XIII.

193344 VITUPERATION OF RICHES.

193345
193346
193347
193348 Ráma said:—It is opulence, Oh sage! that is reckoned a blessing here; 193349 it is even she that is the cause of our troubles and errors.
193350
193351 2. She bears away as a river in the rainy season, all high-spirited 193352 simpletons overpowered by its current.
193353
193354 3. Her daughters are anxieties fostered by many a malpractice, like the 193355 waves of a stream raised by the winds.
193356
193357 4. She can never stand steady on her legs any where, but like a 193358 wretched woman who has burnt her feet, she limps from one place to 193359 another.
193360
193361 5. Fortune like a lamp both burns and blackens its possessor, until it 193362 is extinguished by its own inflammation.
193363
193364 6. She is unapproachable as princes and fools, and likewise as 193365 favourable as they to her adherents, without scanning their merits or 193366 faults.
193368 7. She begets only evils in them by their various acts (of profligacy), 193369 as good milk given to serpents, serves but to increase the poignancy of 193370 their poison.
193371
193372 8. Men (by nature) are gentle and kind hearted to friends and 193373 strangers, until they are hardheartened by their riches, which like 193374 blasts of wind, serve to stiffen (the liquid) frost.
193375
193376 9. As brilliant gems are soiled by dust, so are the learned, the brave, 193377 the grateful, the mild and gentle, corrupted by riches.
193378
193379 10. Riches do not conduce to one's happiness, but redound to his woe and destruction, as the plant aconite when fostered, hides in itself the fatal poison.

11. A rich man without blemish, a brave man devoid of vanity, and a master wanting partiality, are the three rarities on earth.

12. The rich are as inaccessible as the dark cavern of a dragon, and as unapproachable as the deep wilderness of the Vindhyá mountain inhabited by fierce elephants.

13. Riches like the shadow of night, overcast the good qualities of men, and like moon-beams brings to bloom the buds of their misery. They blow away the brightness of a fair prospect as a hurricane, and resemble a sea with huge surges (of disquiet).

14. They bring upon us a cloud of fear and error, increase the poison of despondence and regret, and are like the dreadful snakes in the field of our choice.

15. Fortune is (as a killing) frost to the bondsmen of asceticism, and as the night to the owls of libertinism; she is an eclipse to the moonlight of reason, and as moonbeams to the bloom of the lilies of folly.

16. She is as transitory as the Iris, and alike pleasant to view by the play of her colours; she is as fickle as the lightening, which vanishes no sooner it appears to sight. Hence none but the ignorant have reliance in her.

17. She is as unsteady as a well born damsel following a base-born man to the words; and like a (deceptive) mirage that tempts the run-aways to fall to it as the doe.

18. Unsteady as the wave, she is never steady in any place; (but is ever wavering to all sides) like the flickering flame of a lamp. So her leaning is known to nobody.

19. She like the lioness is ever prompt in fighting, and like the leader of elephants favourable to her partizans. She is as sharp as the blade of a sword (to cut off all obstacles), and is the patroness of sharp-witted sharpers.

20. I see no felicity in uncivil prosperity, which is full of treachery, and replete with every kind of danger and trouble.

21. It is pity that prosperity, like a shameless wench will again lay hold on a man, after being abandoned by him in his association with (her rival) Poverty.

22. What is she with all her loveliness and attraction of human hearts, but momentary thing obtained by all manner of evil means, and resembling at best a flower shrub, growing out of a cave inhabited by a snake, and beset by reptiles all about its stem.

CHAPTER XIV.

DEPRECIATION OF HUMAN LIFE.

Human life is as frail as a pendant drop of water tripling on the tip of a leaflet; and as irrepressible as a raving madman, that breaks loose from its bodily imprisonment out of its proper season.

2. Again the lives of those whose minds are infected by the poison of worldly affairs, and who are incapable of judging for themselves, are (verily) but causes of their torment.

- 193449
193450 3. Those knowing the knowable, and resting in the all-pervading spirit, 193451 and acquiescing alike to their wants and gains, enjoy lives of perfect
193452 tranquility.
193454 4. We that have certain belief of our being but limited beings, can 193455 have no enjoyment in our transient lives, which are but flashes of 193456 lightnings amidst the cloudy sky of the world.
193457
193458 5. It is as impossible to keep the winds in confinement, to tear 193459 asunder the sky to pieces, and wreath the waves to a chaplet, as to 193460 place any reliance in our lives.
193461
193462 6. Fast as the fleeting clouds in autumn, and short as the light of 193463 an oilless lamp, our lives appear to pass away as evanescent as the 193464 rolling waves in the sea.
193465
193466 7. Rather attempt to lay hold on the shadow of the moon in the waves, 193467 the fleeting lightnings in the sky, and the ideal lotus blossoms in 193468 the ether, than ever place any reliance upon this unsteady life.
193469
193470 8. Men of restless minds, desiring to prolong their useless and 193471 toilsome lives, resemble the she-mule conceiving by a horse (which 193472 causes her destruction abortion or unfructification).
193473
193474 9. This world (Sansára) is as a whirlpool amidst the ocean of creation, 193475 and every individual body is as (evanescent) as a foam or froth or 193476 bubble, which can give me no relish in this life.
193477
193478 10. That is called true living, which gains what is worth gaining, 193479 which has no cause of sorrow or remorse, and which is a state of 193480 transcendental tranquility.
193481
193482 11. There is a vegetable life in plants, and an animal life in beasts, 193483 and birds: man leads a thinking life, but true life is above (the 193484 succession of) thoughts.
193485
193486 12. All those living beings are said to have lived well in this earth, 193487 who being once born herein have no more to return to it. The rest are 193488 no better than old asses (of burthen).
193489
193490 13. Knowledge is an encumbrance to the unthinking, and wisdom is 193491 cumbersome to the passionate; intellect—is a heavy load to the 193492 restless, and the body is a ponderous burden to one ignorant of his 193493 soul.
193494
193495 14. A goodly person possessed of life, mind, intellect and 193496 self-consciousness and its occupations, is of no avail to the unwise, 193497 but seem to be his over-loadings as those upon a porter.
193498
193499 15. The discontented mind is the great arena of all evils, and the 193500 nestling place of diseases which alight upon it like birds of the air:
193501 such a life is the abode of toil and misery.
193502
193503 16. As a house is slowly dilapidated by the mice continually burrowing 193504 under it, so is the body of the living gradually corroded by the 193505 (pernicious) teeth of time boring within it.
193506
193507 17. Deadly diseases bred within the body, feed upon our vital breath, 193508 as poisonous snakes born in caves of the woods consume the meadow air.
193509
193510 18. As the withered tree is perforated by minutest worms residing in 193511 them, so are our bodies continually wasted by many inborn diseases and 193512 noxious secretions.
193513
193514 19. Death is incessantly staring and growling at our face, as a cat
193515 looks and purrs at the mouse in order to devour it.
193516
193517 20. Old age wastes us as soon as a glutton digests his food; and it reduces one to weakness as an old harlot, by no other charm than her paint and perfumes.

21. Youth forsakes us as soon, as a good man abandons his wicked friend in disgust, after his foibles come to be known to him in a few days.

22. Death the lover of destruction, and friend of old age and ruin, likes the sensual man, as a lecher likes a beauty.

23. Thus there is nothing so worthless in the world as this life, which is devoid of every good quality and ever subject to death, unless it is attended by the permanent felicity of emancipation.

CHAPTER XV.

OBLOQUY ON EGOISM.

Ráma continued:—

Egoism springs from false conceit, and it is vanity (or vain glory) which fosters it; I am much afraid of this baneful egotism which is an enemy (to human kind).

2. It is under the influence of egotism that all men in this diversified world, and even the very poorest of them, fall into the dungeon of evils, and misdeeds.

3. All accidents, anxieties, troubles and wicked exertions proceed from egoism or self-confidence; hence I deem egoism as a disease.

4. Being subject to that everlasting arch-enemy—the cynic egoism, I have refrained from my food and drink. What other enjoyment is there for me to partake of?

5. This world resembles a long continuous night, in which our egoism like a hunter, spreads the snare of affections (to entrap us in it).

6. All our great and intolerable miseries, growing as rank as the thorny plants of the catechu, are but results of our egoism.

7. It overcasts the equanimity of mind as an eclipse overshadows the moon; it destroys our virtues as a frost destroys the lotus flowers; it dispels the peace of men as the autumn drives away the clouds. I must therefore get rid of this egoistic feeling.

8. I am not Ráma the prince, I have no desire nor should I wish for affluence; but I wish to have the peace of my mind and remain as the self-satisfied old sage Jina.

9. All that I have eaten, done or offered in sacrifice under the influence of egoism, have gone for nothing; it is the absence of egoism which (I call) to be real good.

10. So long, O Bráhmaṇ! as there is (the feeling of) egoism in one, he is subject to sorrow at his difficulties; but being devoid of it, he becomes happy; hence it is better to be without it.

11. I am free from anxiety, O sage! ever since I have got the tranquility of my mind after giving up my (sense of) egoism; and known the transitoriness of all enjoyments.

12. As long, O Bráhmaṇ! as the cloud of egoism overspreads (the region of our minds), so long our desires expand themselves like the buds of _kurchi_ plants (in the rains).

13. But when the cloud of egoism is dispersed, the lightning of avarice vanishes away, just as the lamp being extinguished, its light immediately disappears.
14. The mind vaunts with egoism, like a furious elephant in the Vindhyan hills, when it hears the thunder-claps in the clouds.
15. Again egoism residing like a lion in the vast forest of all human bodies, ranges about at large throughout the whole extent of this earth.
16. The self-conceited are decorated with a string of pearls about their necks, of which avarice forms the thread, and repeated births—the pearls.
17. Our inveterate enemy of egoism, has (like a magician) spread about us the enchantments of our wives, friends and children, whose spells it is hard to break.
18. As soon as the (impression of the) word (ego) is effaced from the mind, all our anxieties and troubles are wiped out of it.
19. The cloud of egoism being dispelled from the sky of our minds, the mist of error which it spreads to destroy our peace, will be dispersed also.
20. I have given up my (sense of) egoism, yet is my mind stupified with sorrow by my ignorance. Tell me, O Bráhmaṇ! what thou thinkest right for me under these circumstances.
21. I have with much ado given up this egoism, and like no more to resort to this source of all evils and perturbation. It retains its seat in the breast for our annoyance only, and without benefiting us by any good quality of its own. Direct me now, you men of great understandings! (to what is right).

CHAPTER XVI.

THE UNGOVERNABLENESS OF THE MIND.

Our minds are infested by evil passions and faults, and fluctuate in their observance of duty and service to superiors, as the plumes of a peacock fluttering at the breeze.

2. They rove about at random with ardour and without rest from one place to another, like the poor village dog running afar and wide in quest of food.

3. It seldom finds any thing any where, and happening even to get a good store some where, it is as little content with it as a wicker vessel filled with water.

4. The vacant mind, Oh sage! is ever entrapped in its evil desires, and is never at rest with itself; but roves at large as a stray deer separated from its herd.

5. Human mind is of the nature of the unsteady wave, and as light as the minutest particle. It can therefore have no rest in spite of (the fickleness and levity of) its nature.

6. Disturbed by its thoughts, the mind is tossed in all directions, like the waters of the milk-white ocean when churned by the Mandara mountain.

7. I can not curb my mind, resembling the vast ocean (in its course), and running with its huge surges (of the passions), with whirlpools (of error), and beset by the whales of delusion.

8. Our minds run afar, O Bráhmaṇ! after sensual enjoyments, like the deer running towards the tender blades of grass, and unmindful of falling into the pits (hid under them).

9. The mind can never get rid of its wavering state owing to the habitual fickleness of its nature, resembling the restlessness of the sea.

10. The mind with its natural fickleness and restless thoughts, finds no repose at any place, as a lion (has no rest) in his prison-house.

11. The mind seated in the car of delusion, absorbs the sweet, peaceful and undisturbed rest of the body, like the gander sucking up pure milk from amidst the water.

12. O chief of sages! I grieve much to find the faculties of the mind lying dormant upon the bed of imaginary delights, from which it is hard to waken them.

13. I am caught, O Bráhmaṇ! like a bird in the net by the knots (of my egoism), and held fast in it by the thread of my avarice.

14. I burn in my mind, O sage, like the dried hay on fire, by the flame of my anxieties and under the spreading fumes of my impatience.

15. I am devoured, O Bráhmaṇ! like a clod of cold meat, by the cruelty and greediness of my heart, as a carcass is swallowed by a hungry dog and its greedy mate.

16. I am borne away, O sage! by the current of my heart, as a tree on the bank is carried away by the waters and waves beating upon it.

17. I am led afar by my (greedy) mind, like a straw carried off by the hurricane, either to flutter in the air or fall upon the ground.

18. My earthly mindedness has put a stop to my desire of crossing over the ocean of the world, as an embankment stops the course of the waters (of a stream).

19. I am lifted up and let down again by the baseness of my heart, like a log of wood tied to a rope dragging it in and out of a well.

20. As a child is seized by the false apparition of a demon, so I find myself in the grasp of my wicked mind, representing falsities as true.

21. It is hard to repress the mind, which is hotter than fire, more inaccessible than a hill, and stronger than a thunder bolt.

22. The mind is attracted to its objects as a bird to its prey, and has no respite for a moment as a boy from his play.

23. My mind resembling the sea both in its dullness as well as restlessness, in its extent and fulness with whirlpools and dragons, keeps me far from advancing towards it.

24. It is more difficult to subdue the mind than to drink off the ocean, or to upset the Sumeru mountain. It is ever harder than the hardest thing.

25. The mind is the cause of all exertions, and the sensorium of the three worlds. Its weakness weakens all worldliness, and requires to be cured with care.

26. It is the mind from which arise our pains and pleasures by hundreds, as the woods growing in groups upon a hill; but no sooner is the scythe of reason applied to them, than they fall off one by one.

193725 27. I am ready to subdue my mind which is my greatest enemy in this 193726 world, for the purpose of mastering all the virtues, which the learned 193727 say depend upon it. My want of desires has made me averse to wealth and 193728 the gross pleasures it yields, which are as tints of clouds tainting 193729 the (clear disk of the) moon (of our mind).

193730
193731
193732
193733
193734 CHAPTER XVII.

193735
193736 ON CUPIDITY.

193738
193739 I see our vices like a flock of owls flying about in the region of our 193740 minds, under the darkness of our affections, and in the lonesome night
193741 of our avarice.

193743 2. I am parched by my anxieties like the wet clay under solar rays, 193744 infusing an inward heat in it by extraction of its soft moisture.

193745
193746 3. My mind is like a vast and lonesome wilderness, covered under 193747 the mist of errors, and infested by the terrible fiend of desire is 193748 continually floundering about it.

193750 4. My wailings and tears serve only to expand and mature my anxiety, as 193751 the dew of night open and ripen the blossoms of beans and give them a 193752 bright golden hue.

193754 5. Avarice by raising expectations in men, serves only to whirl them 193755 about, as the vortex of the sea wallows the marine animals in it.

193757 6. The stream of worldly avarice flows like a rapid current within 193758 the rock of my body, with precipitate force (in my actions), and loud
193759 resounding waves (of my speech).

193761 7. Our minds are driven by foul avarice from one place to another, as 193762 the dusty dry hays are borne away by the winds, and as the Chátakas 193763 are impelled by thirst to fly about (for drink).

193764
193765 8. It is avarice which destroys all the good qualities and grace which 193766 we adopted to ourselves in good faith, just as the mischievous mouse 193767 severs the wires (of a musical instrument).

193769 9. We turn about upon the wheel of our cares, like withered leaves 193770 (floating) upon the water, and like dry grass uplifted by the wind, and 193771 as autumnal clouds (moving) in the sky.

193773 10. Being over powered by avarice, we are disable to reach the goal (of 193774 perfection), as a bird entangled in the snare, is kept from its flight.

193776 11. I am so greatly burnt by the flame of avarice, that I doubt whether 193777 this inflammation may be assuaged even by administration of nectar 193778 itself.

193780 12. Avarice like a heated-mare takes me far and farther still from my 193781 place, and brings me back to it again and again. Thus it hurries me up 193782 and down and to and fro in all directions for ever.

193783
193784 13. We are pulled up and cast down again like a bucket in the well, by 193785 the string of avarice (tied about our necks).

193787 14. Man is led about like a bullock of burthen by his avarice, which 193788 bends his heart as fast as the string does the beast, and which it is 193789 hard for him to break.

193791 15. As the huntress spreads her net to catch birds in it, so does our 193792 affection for our friends, wives and children stretch these snares to 193793 entrap us every day.

16. Avarice like a dark night terrifies even the wise, blindfolds the keen-sighted, and depresses the spirit of the happiest of men.
17. Our appetite is as heinous as a serpent, soft to feel, but full of deadly poison, and bites us as soon as it is felt.
18. It is also like a black sorceress that deludes men by her magic, but pierces him in his heart, and exposes him to danger afterwards.
19. This body of ours shattered by our avarice is like a worn out lute, fastened by arteries resembling the wires, but emitting no pleasing sound.
20. Our avarice is like the long fibered, dark and juicy poisonous creeper called Kaduka, that grows in the caverns of mountains, and maddens men by its flavour.
21. Avarice is as vain and inane, fruitless and aspiring, unpleasant and perilous, as the dry twig of a tree, which (bears no fruit or flower) but is hurtful with its prickly point.
22. Venality is like a churlish old woman, who from the incontinence of her heart, courts the company of every man, without gaining the object of her desire.
23. Greediness as an old actress plays her various parts in the vast theatre of world, in order to please the different tastes of her audience.
24. Parsimony is as a poisonous plant growing in the wide wilderness of the world, bearing old age and infirmity as its flowers, and producing our troubles as its fruits.
25. Our churlishness resembles an aged actress, attempting a manly feat she has not the strength to perform, yet keeping up the dance without pleasing (herself or any body).
26. Our fleeting thoughts are as fickle as pea-hens, soaring over inaccessible heights under the clouds (of ignorance); but ceasing to fly in the day light (of reason).
27. Avarice is like a river in the rains, rising for a time with its rolling waves, and afterwards lying low in its empty bed. (Such are the avaricious by the flux and reflux of their fortunes).
28. Avarice is as inconstant as a female bird, which changes her mates at times, and quits the arbor that no longer bears any fruit.
29. The greedy are as unsteady as the flouncing monkey, which is never restive at any place, but moves to places impassable by others, and craving for fruits even when satiate.
30. The acts of avarice are as inconstant as those of chance, both of which are ever on the alert, but never attended with their sequence.
31. Our venality is like a black-bee sitting upon the lotus of our hearts, and thence making its rambles above, below and all about us in a moment.
32. Of all worldly evils, avarice is the source of the longest woe. She exposes to peril even the most secluded man.
33. Avarice like a group of clouds, is fraught with a thick mist of error, obstructing the light of heaven, and causing a dull insensibility (in its possessor).
34. Penury which seems to gird the breasts of worldly people with chains of gems and jewels, binds them as beasts with halters about the 193863 necks.

193865 35. Covetousness stretches itself long and wide and presents to us a 193866 variety of hues as the rainbow. It is equally unsubstantial and without 193867 any property as the iris, resting in vapour and vacuum and being but a 193868 shadow itself.

193870 36. It burns away our good qualities as electric fire does the hay; it
193871 numbs our good sense as the frost freezes the lotus; it grows our evils
193872 as autumn does the grass; and it increases our ignorance as the winter 193873 prolongs the night.

193875 37. Greediness is as an actress in the stage of the world; she is as a 193876 bird flying out of the nest of our houses; as a deer running about in 193877 the desert of our hearts; and as a lute making us sing and dance at its 193878 tune.

193880 38. Our desires like billows toss us about in the ocean of our earthly 193881 cares; they bind us fast to delusion as fetters do the elephant. Like 193882 the ficus indicus they produce the roots of our regeneration, and 193883 like moon beams they put our budding woes to bloom.

193884
193885 39. Avarice like (Pandora's) box is filled with miseries, decrepitude 193886 and death, and is full of disorder and disasters like a mad bacchanal.

193888 40. Our wishes are sometimes as pure as light and at others as foul as 193889 darkness; now they are as clear as the milky way, and again as obscure 193890 as thickest mists.

193892 41. All our bodily troubles are avoided by our abstaining from avarice, 193893 as we are freed from fear of night goblins at the dispersion of 193894 darkness.

193896 42. So long do men remain in their state of (dead like) dumbness and 193897 mental delirium, as they are subject to the poisonous cholic of avarice.

193899 43. Men may get rid of their misery by their being freed from 193900 anxieties. It is the abandonment of cares which is said to be the best 193901 remedy of avarice.

193903 44. As the fishes in a pond fondly grasp the bait in expectation of a 193904 sop, so do the avaricious lay hold on any thing, be it wood or stone or 193905 even a straw.

193907 45. Avarice like an acute pain excites even the gravest of men to 193908 motion, just as the rays of the sun raise the lotus blossoms (above the 193909 water).

193911 46. It is compared with the bamboo in its length, hollowness, hard 193912 knots, and thorny prickles, and yet it is entertained in expectation of 193913 its yielding the manna and a pearly substance.

193914
193915 47. Yet it is a wonder that high-minded men, have been able to cut off 193916 this almost unseverable knot of avarice, by the glittering sword of 193917 reason:

193918
193919 48. As neither the edge of the sword, nor the fire of lightening, nor 193920 the sparks of the red-hot iron, are sharp enough to sever the keen 193921 avarice seated in our hearts.

193923 49. It is like the flame of a lamp which is bright but blackening and 193924 acutely burning at its end. It is fed by the oily wicks (of years), is 193925 vivid in all, but never handled by any body.

193927 50. Penury has the power of bemeaning the best of men to (the baseness 193928 of) straws in a moment, notwithstanding their wisdom, heroism and 193929 gravity in other respects.

193931 51. Avarice is like the great valley of the Vindhya hills, that is beset with deserts and impenetrable forests, is terrible and full of snares laid by the hunters, and filled with the dust and mist (of delusion).

52. One single avarice has every thing in the world for its object, and though seated in the breast, it is imperceptible to all. It is as the undulating Milky ocean in this fluctuating world, sweeping all things yet regaling mankind with its odorous waves.

CHAPTER XVIII.

OBLOQUY OF THE BODY.

This body of ours that struts about on earth, is but a mass of humid entrails and tendons, tending to decay and disease, and to our torment alone.

2. It is neither quiescent nor wholly sentient, neither ignorant nor quite intelligent. Its inherent soul is a wonder, and it is reason (and its absence) that makes it graceful or otherwise.

3. The sceptic is doubtful of its inertness and intellection: and the unreasonable and ignorant people are ever subject to error and illusion.

4. The body is as easily gratified with a little, as it is exhausted in an instant, hence there is nothing so pitiable, abject and worthless as our bodies.

5. The face is as frail as a fading flower: now it shoots forth its teeth like filaments, and now it dresses itself with blooming and blushing smiles as blossoms.

6. The body is as a tree, having its arms resembling the branches, the shoulder-blades like stems, the teeth as rows of birds, the eye-holes like its hollows, and the head as a big fruit.

7. The ears are as two wood-peckers, the fingers of both hands and feet as so many leaves of the branches, the diseases as (parasite) plants, and the acts of the body are as axes felling this tree, which is the seat of the two birds the soul and intelligence.

8. This shady arbor of the body, is but the temporary resort of the passing soul, what then whether it be akin to or apart from anybody, or whether one would rely in it or not.

9. What man is there, O venerable fathers! that would stoop to reflect within himself, that this body is repeatedly assumed only to serve him as a boat to pass over the sea of the world.

10. Who can rely any confidence in his body, which is as a forest full of holes, and abounds in hairs resembling its trees?

11. The body composed of flesh, nerves and bones, resembles a drum without any musical sound, and yet I sit watching it as a cat (for the squeaking of mice).

12. Our bodies are as trees growing in the forest of the world, bearing the flowers of anxiety, and perforated by the worms of woe and misery, and mounted upon by the apish mind.

13. The body with its smiling face appears a goodly plant, bearing the fruits both of good and evil; but it has become the abode of the dragon of avarice, and a rookery of the ravens of anger.

14. Our arms are as the boughs of trees, and our open palms like

194001 beautiful clusters of flowers, the other limbs are as twigs and leaves, 194002 and are continually shaken by the breath of life.

194003
194004 15. The two legs are the erect stems (of the arbor of the body), and 194005 the organs are the seats of the birds of sense. Its youthful bloom is a 194006 shade for the passing traveller of love.

194008 16. The hanging hairs of the head resemble the long grass growing on 194009 the tree (of the body); and egoism like a vulture (in hollow), cracks
194010 the ear with its hideous shrieks.

194012 17. Our various desires like the pendant roots and fibres of the fig 194013 tree, seem to support its trunk of the body, though it is worn out by 194014 labour to unpleasantness.

194016 18. The body is the big abode of its owner's egoism, and therefore it 194017 is of no interest to me whether it lasts or falls (for egoism is the 194018 bane of happiness).

194020 19. This body which is linked with its limbs like beasts of burthen
194021 labour, and is the abode of its mistress Avarice—painted over by her 194022 taints of passions, affords me no delight whatever.

194023
194024 20. This abode of the body which is built by the frame-work of the 194025 back-bone and ribs, and composed of cellular vessels, tied together by 194026 ropes of the entrails, is no way desirable to me.

194028 21. This mansion of the body, which is tied with strings of the 194029 tendons, and built with the clay of blood and moisture, and plastered 194030 white with old age, is no way suited to my liking.

194031
194032 22. The mind is the architect and master of this bodily dwelling, and 194033 our activities are its supports and servants; it is filled with errors
194034 and delusions which I do not like.

194036 23. I do not like this dwelling of the body with its bed of pleasure on 194037 one side, and the cries of pain as those of its children on the other,
194038 and where our evil desires are at work like its bawling hand-maids.

194039
194040 24. I cannot like this body, which like a pot of filth, is full of 194041 the foulness of worldly affairs, and mouldering under the rust of our 194042 ignorance.

194044 25. It is a hovel standing on the two props of our heels, and supported 194045 by the two posts of our legs.

194046 194047 26. It is no lovely house where the external organs are playing their 194048 parts, while its mistress the understanding sits inside with her brood 194049 of anxieties.

194051 27. It is a hut which is thatched over with the hairs on the head, 194052 decorated with the turrets of the ears, and adorned with jewels on the 194053 crest, which I do not like.

194055 28. This house of the body is walled about by all its members, and 194056 beset by hairs growing like ears of corn on it. It has an empty space 194057 of the belly within (which is never full), and which I do not like.

194059 29. This body with its nails as those of spiders, and its entrails
194060 growling within like barking dogs, and the internal winds emitting 194061 fearful sounds, is never delightful to me.

194063 30. What is this body but a passage for the ceaseless inhaling and 194064 breathing out of the vital air? Its eyes are as two windows which 194065 are continually oped and closed by the eyelids. I do not like such a 194066 mansion as this.

194068 31. This mansion of the body with its formidable (wide-open) door of 194069 the mouth, and (ever-moving) bolt of the tongue and bars of the teeth, is not pleasant to me.

32. This house of the body, having the white-wash of ointments on the outer skin, and the machinery of the limbs in continued motion, and the restless mind burrowing its base like the mischievous mouse, is not liked by me.

33. Sweet smiles like shining lamps, serve to lighten this house of the body for a moment, but it is soon darkened by a cloud of melancholy, wherefore I cannot be pleased with it.

34. This body which is the abode of diseases, and subject to wrinkles and decay, and all kinds of pain, is a mansion wherewith I am not pleased.

35. I do not like this wilderness of the body, which is infested by the bears of the senses. It is empty and hollow within, with dark groves (of entrails) in the inside.

36. I am unable, O chief of sages! to drag my domicile of the body, just as a weak elephant is incapable to draw out another immersed in a muddy pit.

37. Of what good is affluence or royalty, this body and all its efforts to one, when the hand of time must destroy them all in a few days.

38. Tell me, O sage! what is charming in this body, that is only a composition of flesh and blood both within and without it and frail in its nature.

39. The body does not follow the soul upon death; tell me Sir, what regard should the learned have for such an ungrateful thing as this.

40. It is as unsteady as the ears of an infuriate elephant, and as fickle as drops of water that trickle on their tips. I should like therefore to abandon it, before it comes to abandon me.

41. It is as tremulous as the leaves of a tree shaken by the breeze, and oppressed by diseases and fluctuations of pleasure and pain. I have no relish in its pungency and bitterness.

42. With all its food and drink for evermore, it is as tender as a leaflet and is reduced to leanness in spite of all our cares, and runs fast towards its dissolution.

43. It is repeatedly subjected to pleasure and pain, and to the succession of affluence and destitution, without being ashamed of itself as the shameless vulgar herd (at their ups and downs).

44. Why nourish this body any longer, when it acquires no excellence nor durability of its state, after its enjoyment of prosperity and exercise of authority for a length of time.

45. The bodies of the rich as well as those of the poor, are alike subject to decay and death at their appointed times.

46. The body lies as a tortoise in the cave of avarice amidst the ocean of the world. It remains there in the mud in a mute and torpid state, without an effort for its liberation.

47. Our bodies floating as heaps of wood on the waves of the world, serve at last for the fuel of funeral fire (on the pile); except a few of these which pass for human bodies in the sight of the wise.

48. The wise have little to do with this tree of the body, which is beset by evils like noxious orchids about it, and produces the fruit of perdition.

49. The body like a frog, lies merged in the mire of mortality, where 194139 it perishes no sooner it is known to have lived and gone.

194141 50. Our bodies are as empty and fleeting as gusts of wind, passing over 194142 a dusty ground, where nobody knows whence they come, and whither they 194143 go.

194145 51. We know not the course of our bodies (their transmigrations), as we 194146 do not know those of the winds, light and our thoughts; they all come 194147 and go, but from where and whither, we know nothing of.

194149 52. Fie and shame to them, that are so giddy with the ebriety of their 194150 error, as to rely on any state or durability of their bodies.

194152 53. They are the best of men, O sage! whose minds are at rest with the 194153 thought, that their _ego_ does not subsist in their bodies, nor are the 194154 bodies theirs at the end (of their lives).

194156 54. Those mistaken men that have a high sense of honor and fear
194157 dishonor, and take a pleasure in the excess of their gains, are verily 194158 the killers both of their bodies and souls.

194159
194160 55. We are deceived by the delusion of egoism, which like a female 194161 fiend (sorceress) lies hid within the cavity of the body with all her 194162 sorcery.

194164 56. Our reason unaided (by religion) is kept in bondage like a female 194165 slave within the prison of our bodies, by the malicious fiend of false 194166 knowledge (or sophistry).

194168 57. It is certain that whatever we see here is unreal, and yet it is 194169 a wonder, that the mass of men are led to deception by the vile body, 194170 which has injured the cause of the soul.

194171
194172 58. Our bodies are as fleeting as the drops of a water-fall, and they 194173 fall off in a few days like the withered leaves of trees.

194175 59. They are as quickly dissolved as bubbles in the ocean; it is in 194176 vain therefore that it should hurl about in the whirlpool of business.

194177
194178 60. I have not a moment's reliance in this body, which is ever 194179 hastening to decay; and I regard its changeful delusions as a state of 194180 dreaming.

194182 61. Let those who have any faith in the stability of the lightning, of 194183 the autumn clouds, and in glacial castles, place their reliance in this 194184 body.

194186 62. It has outdone all other things that are doomed to destruction in 194187 its instability and perishableness. It is moreover subject to very 194188 many evils; wherefore I have set it at naught as a straw, and thereby 194189 obtained my repose.

194190 194191 194192 194193 194194 CHAPTER XIX.

194195 194196 BLEMISHES OF BOYHOOD.

194198
194199 One receiving his birth in the unstable ocean of the world, which is 194200 disturbed by the billows of the bustle of business, has to pass his 194201 boyhood in sufferings only.

194203 2. Want of strength and sense, and subjection to diseases and dangers, 194204 muteness and appetite, joined with longings and helplessness, are the 194205 concomitants of infancy.

194207 3. Childhood is chained to fretting and crying, to fits of anger, craving and every kind of incapacity, as an elephant when tied to the post by its shackles.

4. The vexations which tease the infant breast, are far greater than those which trouble us in youth and old age, or disturb one in disease, danger or at the approach of death.

5. The acts of a boy are as those of young animals, that are always restless and snubbed by every body. Hence boyhood is more intolerable than death itself.

6. How can boyhood be pleasing to any body, when it is but a semblance of gross ignorance, and full of whims and hobbies, and ever subject to miscarriages.

7. It is this silly boyhood which is in constant dread of dangers arising at every step from fire, water and air, and which rarely betide us in other states of life.

8. Boys are liable to very many errors in their plays and wicked frolics, and in all their wishes and attempts beyond their capacities: hence boyhood is the most perilous state (of life).

9. Boys are engaged in false pursuits and wicked sports, and are subject to all foolish puerilities. Hence boyhood is fit for the rod and not for rest.

10. All faults, misconduct, transgressions and heart-aches, lie hidden in boyhood like owls in hollow caves.

11. Fie to those ignorant and foolish people, who are falsely led to imagine boyhood as the most pleasant period of life.

12. How can boyhood appear pleasing to any one, when the mind swings like a cradle towards every object of desire, however wrong it is deemed to be in both worlds.

13. The minds of all living beings are ever restless, but those of young people are ten times more at unrest.

14. The mind is naturally unsteady, and so is boyhood also. Say what can save us from that state of life, when both these vagrant things combine to our destruction.

15. The glances of women, the flashes of lightning, the flame of fire, and the ever-rolling waves, have all imitated the fickleness of boyhood.

16. Minority seems to be a twin brother to the mind, and resembles it in the unsteadiness and frailty of all its purposes.

17. All kinds of miseries, misdeeds and miscarriages await on boyhood, as all sorts of men hang upon the rich (for their supportance).

18. Boys are fond of fresh things at all times, and on their failing to get the same, they fall to a fainting fit, as if from the effect of poison.

19. A boy like a dog, is as easily tamed as he is irritated at a little, and he is as glad to lie in the dust, as to play with dirt.

20. A foolish fretful boy with his body daubed in mire with the tears in his eyes, appears as a heap of dry clay soiled by a shower of rain.

21. Boys are subject to fear and voracity; they are helpless but fond of every thing they have seen or heard, and equally fickle in their bodies and mind. Hence boyhood is a source of troubles only.

22. The foolish and helpless child, becomes as sad and sour when he fails to get the object of his fancy, as when he is thwarted from the 194277 thing desired.

194279 23. Children have much difficulty to get at the things they want, and 194280 which they can ask only by indistinct words. Hence no one suffers so 194281 much as boys.

194283 24. A boy is as much irritated by the eagerness of his whimsical 194284 desires, as a patch of ground in the desert is parched by the summer 194285 heat.

194287 25. A boy on entering his school, is subjected to corrections, which 194288 are as painful to him as the goading and fetters to the elephant.

194290 26. A great many whims and hobbies, and a variety of false fancies, 194291 tend continually to afflict boyhood, which is ever fond of toys and 194292 trifles.

194294 27. How can senseless childhood be said to be a happy state of life, 194295 when the child is led by its ignorance to swallow everything in the 194296 world, and to wish to lay hold on the moon in the sky.

194298 28. Say great sage! what difference is there between a child and a 194299 tree, both of which have sensitiveness, but unable to defend themselves 194300 from heat and cold.

194302 29. Boys are of the nature of birds, being both subject to fear and 194303 hunger, and ready to fly about when impelled by them.

194305 30. Again boyhood is the abode of fear from all sides; such as from the 194306 tutor, father, mother, elder brother and elderly boys, and from every 194307 body besides.

194309 31. Hence the hopeless state of childhood, which is full of faults 194310 and errors, and addicted to sports and thoughtlessness, cannot be 194311 satisfactory to any body.

194313
194314
194315
194316 CHAPTER XX.

194317
194318 VITUPERATION OF YOUTH.

194319

194323 The boy having passed his state of blemishes, gladly steps to his youth 194324 with hopes of gaining his objects that tend only to his ruin.

194326 2. The insensible youth feels at this time the wanton inclinations of 194327 his loose mind, and goes on falling from one tribulation to another.

194328
194329 3. He is overcome as one subdued by the power of delusive Cupid, lying 194330 hidden in the cavity of the heart (hence called _Manoja_).

194331
194332 4. His ungoverned mind gives rise to loose thoughts like those of 194333 voluptuous women, and these serve to beguile him like the magic 194334 collyrium (in the hand) of boys (called _Siddhánjana_).

194335
194336 5. Vices of the most heinous kind betake persons of such (perverse)
194337 minds in their youth, and lead them to their ruin.

194338
194339 6. The paths of youth lead them to the gate of hell through a maze of 194340 errors. Those that have been left uncorrupt by their youth, are not to 194341 be corrupted by anything else.

194343 7. Whoso has passed the dreadfully enchanted coast of youth, fraught 194344 with various flavours and wonders, are said to be truly wise.

194345

8. I take no delight in our unwelcome youth, which appears to us in the form of a momentary flash of lightning, and soon succeeded by the loud roaring of the clouds (of manhood).
9. Youth like rich wine is sweet and delicious (at first), but becomes bitter, insipid and noxious in a short time. Hence it is not delectable to me.
10. Youth appearing (at first) as a reality, is found to be a false, transient thing, as deceptive as a fairy dream by night. Hence I like it not.
11. It is the most charming of all things to men, but its charm is soon lost and fled. Therefore the phantasmagoria of youth is not pleasing to me.
12. Youth as an arrow-shot is pleasant to see, but painful to feel its smart. Hence I do not like youth that produces blood heat (in the veins).
13. Youth as a harlot is charming at first sight, but turning heartless soon after. Hence it is not to my liking.
14. As the efforts of a dying man are all for his torment, so the exertions of the young are portentous of his destruction.
15. Puberty advances as a dark night spreading the shadow of destruction. It darkens the heart and mind by its hedious appearance, and intimidates even the god (Siva himself).
16. Errors growing in youth, cause copious mistakes in life, by upsetting good sense and setting at naught the approved good manners (of society).
17. The raging fire in the hearts of the young, caused by separation of their mates, burns them down like trees by a wild fire.
18. As a clear, sacred and wide stream, becomes muddy in the rains, so doth the mind of man however clear, pure and expanded it may be, gets polluted in his youth.
19. It is possible for one to cross over a river made terrible by its waves, but no way possible to him to get over the boisterous expanse of his youthful desires.
20. O how (lamentably) is one's youth worn out with the thoughts of his mistress, her swollen breasts, her beautiful face and her sweet caresses.
21. The young man afflicted with the pain of soft desire, is regarded by the wise in no better light than a fragment of (useless) straw.
22. Youth is the stake of haughty self-esteem, as the rack is for the immolation of the elephant giddy with its frontal pearl.
23. Youth is a lamentable forest, where the mind as the root of all, gives growth to jungles of (love sick) groans and sighs, and tears of sorrow. The vices of this time, are as venomous snakes of the forest.
24. Know youthful bloom of the person to resemble the blooming lotus of the lake:—the one is full of affections, bad desires and evil intents, as the other is fraught with bees, filaments, petals and leaves.
25. The new bloom of youth is the resort of anxiety and disease, which like two birds with their (black and white) plumage of vice and virtue, frequent the fountain of the young man's heart.
26. Early youth resembles a deep sea, disturbed by the waves of numberless amusements, transgressing all bounds, and regardless of 194415 death and disease.

194416
194417 27. Youth is like a furious gust of wind, over-loaded with the dust of 194418 pride and vanity, and sweeps away every trace of the good qualities 194419 (early acquired by one).

194421 28. The rude dust of the passions of youths, disfigures their face, 194422 and the hurricane of their sensualities cover their good qualities (as 194423 flying leaves overspread the ground).

194425 29. Youthful vigour awakens a series of faults, and destroys a group of 194426 good qualities, by increasing the vice of pleasures.

194427
194428 30. Youthful bloom confines the fickle mind to some beauteous person, 194429 as the bright moon-beams serve to shut the flitting bee in the dust of 194430 the closing lotus.

194432 31. Youth like a delightful cluster of flowers, growing in the harbour
194433 of human body, attracts the mind as the bee to it, and makes it giddy 194434 (with its sweets).

194436 32. The human mind anxious to derive pleasure from the youthfulness of 194437 the body, falls into the cave of sensuality, as a deer running after 194438 the mirage of desert heat, falls down into a pit.

194439
194440 33. I take no delight in moony youth, which guilds the dark body with 194441 its beams, and resembles the stern mane of the leonine mind. It is a 194442 surge in the ocean of our lives (that tosses us all about).

194443
194444 34. There is no reliance in youth, which fades away as soon as summer
194445 flowers in this desert of the body.

194447 35. Youth is as a bird, and as soon flies away from our bodily cage as 194448 the philosopher's stone, which quickly disappears from the hands of the 194449 unfortunate.

194451 36. As youth advances to its highest pitch, so the feverish passions 194452 wax stronger for our destruction only.

194454 37. As long as the night (delusion) of youth does not come to its end, 194455 so long the fiends of our passion do not cease to rage in the desert of 194456 the body.

194457
194458 38. Pity me, O sage! in this state of youth, which is so full of 194459 perturbations, as to have deprived me of the sight (light) of reason. O 194460 pity me as thou wouldst for thy dying son.

194461
194462 39. The foolish man who ignorantly rejoices at his transient youth, is 194463 considered as a human beast.

194464
194465 40. The foolish fellow who is fond of his youth which is flushed with 194466 pride and fraught with errors, comes to repent (of his folly) in a 194467 short time.

194469 41. Those great minded men are honoured on earth, who have safely 194470 passed over the perils of youth.

194472 42. One crosses over with ease the wide ocean which is the horrible 194473 habitation of huge whales; but it is hard to pass over our youth, that 194474 is so full of vices and the billows (of our passions).

194475
194476 43. It is very rare to have that happy youth which is fraught with 194477 humility, and spent in the company of respectable men; which is 194478 distinguished by feelings of sympathy, and is joined with good 194479 qualities and virtues.

194480
194481
194482
194483

VITUPERATION OF WOMEN.

Râma added:—

What beauty is there in the person of a woman, composed of nerves, bones and joints? She is a mere statue of flesh, and a frame of moving machinery with her ribs and limbs.

2. Can you find any thing beautiful in the female form, separated from its (component parts of the) flesh, skin, blood and water, that is worth beholding? Why then dote upon it?

3. This fairy frame consisting of hairs in one part and blood in the other, cannot engage the attention of a high-minded man to its blemishes.

4. The bodies of females, that are so covered with clothing and repeatedly besmeared with paints and perfumes, are (at last) devoured by carnivorous (beasts and worms).

5. The breasts of women decorated with strings of pearl, appear as charming as the pinnacles of Sumeru, washed by the waters of Ganges falling upon them.

6. Look at these very breasts of the woman becoming at last a lump of food, to be devoured by dogs in cemeteries and on the naked ground.

7. There is no difference between a woman and a young elephant that lives in the jungle, both of them being made of blood, flesh and bones. Then why hunt after her.

8. A woman is charming only for a short time, and does not long last to be so. I look upon her merely as a cause of delusion.

9. There is no difference between wine and a woman, both of them tending equally to produce high-flown mirth and jollity, and creating revelry and lust.

10. Uxorious men are like chained elephants among mankind, that will never come to sense however goaded by the hooks of reason.

11. Women are the flames of vice, their black-dyed eye and hairs are as their smoke and soot. They are as intangible as fire, though pleasing to the sight. They burn the man as fire consumes the straw.

12. They burn from afar (more than fire), and are as dry as bones (in their hearts), though appearing as soft and juicy to sight. They serve as fuel to the fire of hell, and are dangerous with their charmingness.

13. The woman resembles a moon-light night, veiled over by her loosened locks, and looking through her starry eyes. She shows her moon-like face amidst her flowery smiles.

14. Her soft dalliance destroys all manly energy, and her caresses overpower the good sense of men, as the shade of night does the sleeping (world).

15. The woman is as lovely as a creeper in its flowering time. Her palm are the leaves and her eyes as the black-bees (on the flower). Her breasts are as the uplifted tops of the plant.

16. The lovely damsel is like a poisonous creeper, fair as the filament of a flower but destructive of life, by causing inebriation and insensibility.

17. As the snake-catcher entices the snake by his breath and brings

194553 it out of its hole, so does the woman allure the man by her officious 194554 civilities, and gets him under her control.

194556 18. Concupiscence as a huntsman, has spread his nets in the forms of 194557 women, for the purpose of ensnaring the persons of deluded men like 194558 silly birds.

194560 19. The mind of man though as fierce <as> that of a furious elephant, 194561 is tied fast by the chain of love to the fulcrum of women, just as an 194562 elephant is fastened (by his leg) to the post, where he remains dull 194563 and dumb for ever.

194565 20. Human life is as a pool in which the mind moves about in its mud 194566 and mire (as a fish). Here it is caught by the bait of woman, and 194567 dragged along by the thread of its impure desires.

194569 21. The beauteous-eyed damsel is a bondage to man, as the stable is to 194570 the horse, the fastening post to the elephant, and as spells are to the 194571 snakes.

194573 22. This wondrous world, with all its delights and enjoyments, began 194574 with woman and depends on women for its continuance.

194576 23. A woman is the casket of all gems of vice (Pandora's box), she is 194577 the cause of the chain of our everlasting misery, and is of no use to 194578 me.

194580 24. What shall I do with her breast, her eyes, her loins, her eyebrows, 194581 the substance of which is but flesh, and which therefore is altogether
194582 unsubstantial.

194584 25. Here and there, O Bráhmaṇ! her flesh and blood and bones undergo a 194585 change for the worse in course of a few days.

194587 26. You see sir, those dearly beloved mistresses, who are so much 194588 fondled by foolish men, lying at last in the cemetery, and the members 194589 of their bodies all mangled and falling off from their places.

194591 27. O Bráhmaṇ! those dear objects of love—the faces of damsels, so 194592 fondly decorated by their lovers with paints and pastes, are at last to 194593 be singed on the piles (by those very hands).

194595 28. Their braided hairs now hang as flappers of chouri on the arbors
194596 of the cemetery, and their whitened bones are strewn about as shining 194597 stars after a few days.

194599 29. Behold their blood sucked in by the dust of the earth, voracious
194600 beasts and worms feeding upon their flesh, jackals tearing their skin, 194601 and their vital air wafted in the vacuum.

194603 30. This is the state to which the members of the female body must 194604 shortly come to pass, you say all existence to be delusion, tell me 194605 therefore why do you allow yourselves to fall into error?

194607 31. A woman is no other than a form composed of the five elements, then 194608 why should intelligent men be fondly attached to her (at the risk of 194609 their ruin)?

194611 32. Men's longing for women is likened to the creeper called Suta, 194612 which stretches its sprigs to a great length, but bears plenty of 194613 bitter and sour fruits.

194615 33. A man blinded by avarice (for the supportance of his mate) is as a 194616 stray deer from its herd; and not knowing which way to go, is lost in 194617 the maze of illusion.

194619 34. A young man under the control of a young woman, is as much 194620 lamentable as an elephant fallen into a pit of the Vindhya mountain in 194621 pursuit of his mate.

194623 35. He that has a wife, has an appetite for enjoyment on earth; but one 194624 without her has no object of desire. Abandonment of the wife amounts 194625 to the abandoning of the world, and forsaking the world is the path to 194626 true happiness.
194627

194628 36. I am not content, O Bráhmaṇ! with these unmanageable enjoyments 194629 which are as flickering as the wings of bees, and are as soon at an 194630 end as they are born (like the ephemerids of a day). I long only 194631 for the state of supreme bliss, from my fear of repeated-births
194632 (transmigration), decay and death.

194637 CHAPTER XXII.

194638 OBLOQUY OF OLD AGE.

194639
194640
194641
194642 Boyhood has scarcely lost its boyishness when it is overtaken by youth, 194643 which is soon followed by a ruthless old age, devouring the other two.
194644

194645 2. Old age withers the body like a frost freezing the lake of lilies.
194646 It drives away the beauty of the person as a storm does the autumnal 194647 clouds; and it pulls down the body, as a current carries away a tree on 194648 the bank.
194649

194650 3. The old man with his limbs slackened and worn out by age, and his 194651 body weakened by infirmity, is treated by women as a useless beast.
194652

194653 4. Old age drives a man's good sense, as a good wife is driven away by 194654 her step dame.
194655

194656 5. A man in his state of tottering old age, is scoffed at as a dotard
194657 by his own sons and servants, and even by his wife, and all his friends
194658 and relations.
194659

194660 6. Insatiable avarice like a greedy vulture alights on the heads of 194661 the aged, when their appearance grows uncouth, and their bodies become 194662 helpless, and devoid of all manly qualities and powers.
194663

194664 7. Appetite the constant companion of my youth, is thriving along with 194665 my age, accompanied with her evils of indigence, and heart-burning 194666 cares and restlessness.
194667

194668 8. Ah me! what must I do to remove my present and future pains? It is 194669 this fear which increases with old age, and finds no remedy.
194670

194671 9. What am I that am brought to this extremity of senselessness, what 194672 can I do in this state. I must remain dumb and silent. Under these 194673 reflections there is an increased sense of helplessness in old age.
194674

194675 10. How and when and what shall I eat, and what is sweet to taste?
194676 These are the thoughts which trouble the mind of one when old age comes 194677 upon him.
194678

194679 11. There is an insatiable desire for enjoyments, but the powers to 194680 enjoy them are lacking. It is the want of strength which afflicts the 194681 heart in old age.
194682

194683 12. Hoary old age sits and shrieks as a heron on the top of the tree of 194684 this body, which is infested within it by the serpents of sickness.
194685

194686 13. As the grave owl—the bird of night, appears unexpectedly to our 194687 sight soon as the evening shades cover the landscape, so does the 194688 solemn appearance of death overtake us in the eve of our life.
194689

194690 14. As darkness prevails over the world at the eve of the day, so doth 194691 death overtake the body at the eve of the life.

194692
194693 15. Death overtakes a man in his hoary old age, just as an ape alights 194694 on a tree covered with pearly flowers.

194695
194696 16. Even a deserted city, a leafless tree and parched up land may 194697 present a fair aspect, but never does the body look well that is pulled 194698 down by hoary age.

194699
194700 17. Old age with its hooping cough lays hold on a man, just as a 194701 vulture seizes its prey with loud shrieks in order to devour it.

194702
194703 18. As a girl eagerly lays hold on a lotus flower whenever she meets 194704 with one, and then plucks it from its stalk and tears it to pieces, so 194705 does old age overtake the body of a person and break it down at last.

194706
194707 19. As the chill blast of winter shakes a tree and covers its leaves 194708 with dust, so does old age seize the body with a tremor and fill all 194709 its limbs with the rust of diseases.

194710
194711 20. The body overtaken by old age becomes as pale and battered, as a 194712 lotus flower beaten by frost becomes withered and shattered.

194713
194714 21. As moon-beams contribute to the growth of Kumuda flowers on 194715 the top of mountains, so does old age produce grey hairs resembling 194716 casla flowers on the heads of men (with inward phlegm and gout).

194717
194718 22. Death the lord of all beings, views the grey head of a man as a 194719 ripe pumpkin seasoned with the salt of old age, and devours it with 194720 zest.

194721
194722 23. As the Ganges upsets a neighbouring tree by its rapid course, so 194723 does old age destroy the body, as the current of our life runs fast to 194724 decay.

194725
194726 24. Old age which preys on the flesh of the human body, takes as much 194727 delight in devouring its youthful bloom as a cat does in feeding upon a 194728 mouse.

194730 25. Decrepitude raises its ominous hoarse sound of hiccough in the 194731 body, as the jackal sends forth her hideous cry amidst the forest.

194732
194733 26. Dotage as an inward flame consumes the living body as a wet log of 194734 wood, which thereupon emits its hissing sounds of hiccough and hard 194735 breathing, and sends up the gloomy fumes of woe and sighs.

194736
194737 27. The body like a flowering creeper, bends down under the pressure of 194738 age, turns to grey like the fading leaves of a plant, and becomes as 194739 lean and thin as a plant after its flowering time is over.

194740
194741 28. As the infuriate elephant upsets the white plantain tree in a 194742 moment, so does old age destroy the body that becomes as white as 194743 camphor all over.

194745 29. Senility, O sage! is as the standard bearer of the king of death, 194746 flapping his chouri of grey hairs before him, and bringing in his 194747 train an army of diseases and troubles.

194748
194749 30. The monster of old age, will even overcome those that were never 194750 defeated in wars by their enemies, and those that hide themselves in 194751 the inaccessible caverns of mountains.

194752
194753 31. As infants cannot play in a room that has become cold with snow, so 194754 the senses can have no play in the body that is stricken with age.

194755
194756 32. Old age like a juggling girl, struts on three legs at the sound of 194757 coughing and whiffing, beating as a tymbal on both sides.

194758
194759 33. The tuft of grey hairs on the head of the aged body, represents a white flapper (_chouri_) fastened to the top of a handle of white sandal wood, to welcome the despot of death.

34. As hoary age makes his advance like moon-light on the site of the body, he calls forth the hidden death to come out of it, as the moon-light makes the _nilumbium_ to unfold its buds.

35. Again as the white wash of old age whitens the outer body, so debility, diseases and dangers become its inmates in the inner apartment.

36. It is the extinction of being that is preceded by old age; therefore I as a man of little understanding, can have no reliance in old age (though extolled by some)[1]

37. What then is the good of this miserable life, which lives under the subjection of old age? Senility is irresistible in this world, and defies all efforts to avoid or overcome it.

CHAPTER XXIII.

VICISSITUDES OF TIMES.

Men of little understandings are found to fall into grave errors in this pit of the world, by their much idle talk, ever doubting scepticism, and schisms (in religion).

2. Good people can have no more confidence in the net work of their ribs, than little children may have a liking for fruits reflected in a mirror.

3. Time is a rat that cuts off the threads of all thoughts (prospects), which men may entertain here about the contemptible pleasures of this world.

4. There is nothing in this world which the all-devouring time will spare. He devours all things as the submarine fire consumes the over-flowing sea.

5. Time is the sovran lord of all, and equally terrible to all things. He is ever ready to devour all visible beings.

6. Time as master of all, spares not even the greatest of us for a moment. He swallows the universe within himself, whence he is known as the universal soul.

7. Time pervades all things, but has no perceptible feature of his own, except that he is imperfectly known by the names of years, ages and _kalpas_ (millenniums).

8. All that was fair and good, and as great as the mount of Meru, have gone down in the womb of eternity, as the snakes are gorged by the greedy Garuda.

9. There was no one ever so unkind, hard-hearted, cruel, harsh or miserly, whom time has not devoured.

10. Time is ever greedy although he should devour the mountains. This great gourmand is not satiated with gorging every thing in all the worlds.

11. Time like an actor plays many parts on the stage of the world. He abstracts and kills, produces and devours and at last destroys every thing.

12. Time is incessantly picking up the seeds of all the four kinds of living beings from this unreal world, as a parrot picks up the seeds from under the cracked shell of a pomegranate. (_Viz._ the ovipari, vivipari, vegetables and the ephemerids).
13. Time like a wild elephant uproots all proud living beings in this world, as the other pulls up the trees of the forest with their tusks.
14. This creation of God is like a forest, having Brahmá for its foundation and its trees full of the great fruits of gods. Time commands it throughout its length and breadth.
15. Time glides along incessantly as a creeping plant, composed of years and ages as its parts, and the sable nights as black bees chasing after them.
16. Time, O sage, is the subtlest of all things. It is divided though indivisible, it is consumed though incombustible, it is perceived though imperceptible in its nature.
17. Time like the mind is strong enough to create and demolish any thing in a trice, and its province is equally extensive with it.
18. Time is a whirlpool to men; and being accompanied with desire his insatiable and ungovernable mistress and delighting in illicit enjoyments, he makes them do and undo the same thing over and again.
19. Time is prompted by his rapacity to appropriate every thing to himself, from the meanest straw, dust, leaves and worms, to the greatest Indra and the mount Meru itself.
20. Time is the source of all malice and greediness, and the spring of all misfortunes, and intolerable fluctuations of our states.
21. As boys with their balls play about their play-ground, so does time in his arena of the sky, play with his two balls of the sun and moon.
22. Time at the expiration of the _kalpa_ age, will dance about with a long chain of the bones of the dead hanging from his neck to the feet.
23. The gale of desolation rising from the body of this desolator of the world at the end of a _kalpa_ age, causes the fragments of mount Meru to fly about in the air like the rinds of the _bhoja-petera_ tree.
24. Time then assumes his terrific form of fire (प्रलयाग्नि), to dissolve the world in empty space, when the gods Brahmá and Indra and all others cease to exist.
25. As the sea shows himself in a continued series of waves rising and falling one after another, so it is time that creates and dissolves the world, and appears to rise and fall in the rotation of days and nights.
26. Time plucks the gods and demigods as ripe fruits, from their great arbor of existence, at the end of the world (to make them his food).
27. Time resembles a large fig tree (Ficus religiosus), studded with all the worlds as its fruits, and resonant with the noise of living beings like the hissing of gnats about them.
28. Time accompanied by Action as his mate, regales himself in the garden of the world, blossoming with the moon-beams of the Divine Spirit.
29. As the high and huge rock supports its body upon the basis of the earth, so does time rest itself in endless and interminable eternity.
30. Time assumes to himself various hues of black, white and red (at night, day and midday) which serve for his vestures.

194897 31. As the earth is the great support of hills which are fixed upon it, 194898 so is time the support of all the innumerable ponderous worlds that 194899 constitute the universe.

194901 32. Hundreds of great _kalpa_ ages (of the creation and dissolution of 194902 the world) may pass away, yet there is nothing that can move eternity 194903 to pity or concern, or stop or expedite his course. It neither sets nor 194904 rises (as time).

194906 33. Time is never proud to think, that it is he who without the least 194907 sense of pain and labor, brings this world into play and makes it to 194908 exist.

194910 34. Time is like a reservoir in which the nights are as mud, the days
194911 as lotuses, and the clouds as bees.

194912
194913 35. As a covetous man, with worn out broom sticks in hand, sweeps over 194914 a mountain to gather the particles of gold strewn over it, so does time 194915 with his sweeping course of days and nights, collect in one mass of the 194916 dead all living beings in the world.

194917
194918 36. As a miserly man trims and lights a lamp with his own fingers, to 194919 look into his stores at each corner of the room; so does time light the 194920 lamps of the sun and moon to look into the living beings in every nook
194921 and corner of the world.

194923 37. As one ripens the raw fruits in sun and fire in order to devour 194924 them, so does time ripen men by their sun and fire worship, to bring 194925 them under his jaws at last.

194926
194927 38. The world is a dilapidated cottage and men of parts are rare gems 194928 in it. Time hides them in the casket of his belly, as a miser keeps his 194929 treasure in a coffer.

194931 39. Good men are like a chaplet of gems, which time puts on his head 194932 for a time with fondness, and then tears and tramples it down (under 194933 his feet).

194934
194935 40. Strings of days, nights and stars, resembling beads and bracelets 194936 of white and black lotuses, are continually turning round the arm of 194937 time.

194939 41. Time (as a vulture) looks upon the world as (the carcase of) a ram, 194940 with its mountains, seas, sky and earth as its four horns, and the 194941 stars as its drops of blood which it drinks day by day.

194942
194943 42. Time destroys youth as the moon shuts the petals of the lotus. It 194944 destroys life as the lion kills the elephant: there is nothing however 194945 insignificant that time steals not away.

194946
194947 43. Time after sporting for a _Kalpa_ period in the act of killing and 194948 crushing of all living beings, comes to lose its own existence and 194949 becomes extinct in the eternity of the Spirit of spirits.

194950
194951 44. Time after a short rest and respite reappears as the creator, 194952 preserver, destroyer and remembrancer of all. He shows the shapes of 194953 all things whether good or bad, keeping his own nature beyond the 194954 knowledge of all. Thus doth time expand and preserve and finally 194955 dissolve all things by way of sport.

194956
194957
194958
194959
194960 CHAPTER XXIV.

194961
194962 RAVAGES OF TIME.

194963
194964
194965 Ráma rejoined:—Time is a self-willed sportsman as a prince, who is 194966 inaccessible to dangers and whose powers are unlimited.

194967
194968 2. This world is as it were a forest and sporting ground of time,
194969 wherein the poor deluded worldlings are caught in his snare like a body
194970 of wounded stags.

194971
194972 3. The ocean of universal deluge is a pleasure-pond of time, and the 194973 submarine fires bursting therein as lotus flowers (serve to beautify 194974 that dismal scene).

194975
194976 4. Time makes his breakfast of this vapid and stale earth, flavoured 194977 with the milk and curd of the seas of those names.

194979 5. His wife Chandi (Hecate) with her train of Mátris (furies), 194980 ranges all about this wide world as a ferocious tigress (with horrid 194981 devastation).

194982
194983 6. The earth with her waters is like a bowl of wine in the hand of 194984 time, dressed and flavoured with all sorts of lilies and lotuses.

194986 7. The lion with his huge body and startling mane, his loud roaring and 194987 tremendous groans, seems as a caged bird of sport in the hand of time.

194988
194989 8. The Mahákála like a playful young Kokila (cuckoo), appears in the 194990 figure of the blue autumnal sky, and warbling as sweet as the notes of 194991 a lute of gourd (in the music of the spheres).

194992
194993 9. The restless bow of death is found flinging its woeful arrows (darts 194994 of death) with ceaseless thunder claps on all sides.

194995
194996 10. This world is like a forest, wherein sorrows are ranging about as 194997 playful apes, and time like a sportive prince in this forest, is now 194998 roving, now walking, now playing and now killing his games.

195000
195001
195002
195003 CHAPTER XXV.

195004
195005 SPORTS OF DEATH.

195006
195007
195008 Time stands the foremost of all deceitful players in this world. He 195009 acts the double parts of creation and destruction, and of action and 195010 fate (utility and fatality).

195011
195012 2. Time has no other character but those of action and motion by 195013 which his existence is known to us, and which bind all beings (in the 195014 succession of thoughts and acts).

195015
195016 3. Fate is that which frustrates (the necessary consequences of) the 195017 acts of all created beings, as the solar heat serves to dissolve the 195018 conglomeration of snows.

195020 4. This wide world is the stage wherein the giddy mob dance about (in 195021 their appointed times).

195022
195023 5. Time has a third name of a terrifying nature known as Kritántah 195024 (Fate), who in the form of a Kápálíka (one holding human skulls in his 195025 hand), dances about in the world.

195026
195027 6. This dancing and loving Kritántah (Fate), is accompanied by 195028 his consort called Destiny to whom he is greatly attached (as his 195029 colleague).

195030
195031 7. Time (as Siva), wears on his bosom of the world, the triplicate 195032 white and holy thread composed of the serpent named Ananta and the 195033 stream of Ganges, and the digit of the moon on his forehead (to measure
195034 his course). (Viz:-the Zodiacal belt; the milky way, and the lunar mansions).

8. The sun and the moon are the golden armlets of time, who holds in his palm the mundane world as the paltry plaything of a nosegay.

9. The firmament with its stars appears like a garment with coloured spots in it; the clouds called Pushkara and Avarta are as the skirts of that garment, which are washed by Time in the waters of the universal deluge.

10. Before him, dances his beloved Destiny with all her arts for ever, to beguile the living that are fond of worldly enjoyments.

11. People hurry up and down to witness the dance of Destiny, whose unrestrained motion keeps them at work, and causes their repeated births and deaths.

12. The people of all the worlds are studded about her person as her ornaments, and the sky stretching from the heaven of gods to the infernal regions, serves for the veil on her head.

13. Her feet are planted in the infernal regions, and the hell-pits ring at her feet like trinkets, tied by the string of evil deeds or sins (of men).

14. She is painted all over from head to foot by the god Chitra Gupta with ornamental marks prepared by her attendants (the deeds of men), and perfumed with the essence of those deeds.

15. She dances and reels at the nod of her husband at the end of the Kalpas, and makes the mountains crack and crash at her foot-falls.

16. Behind her dance the peacocks of the god Kumára; and Kála the god of death staring with his three wide open eyes, utters his hideous cries (of destruction).

17. Death dances about in the form of the five headed Hara, with the loosened braids of hair upon him; while Destiny in the form of Gaurí, and her locks adorned with Mandára flowers keeps her pace with him.

18. This Destiny in her war-dance, bears a capacious gourd representing her big belly, and her body is adorned with hundreds of hollow human skulls jingling like the alms-pots of the Kapáli mendicants.

19. She has filled (reached) the sky with the emaciated skeleton of her body, and gets terrified at her all destructive figure.

20. The skulls of the dead of various shapes adorn her body like a beautiful garland of lotuses, which keep hanging to and fro during her dance at the end of a Kalpa age.

21. The horrible roaring of the giddy clouds Pushkara and Avarta at the end of the Kalpa, serves to represent the beating of her Damaru drum, and put to flight the heavenly choir of Tumburu.

22. As death dances along, the moon appears like his ear-ring, and the moon-beams and stars appear like his crest made of peacocks' feathers.

23. The snow-capt Himálaya, appears like a circlet of bones in the upper loop of his right ear, and the mount Meru as a golden areola in that of the left.

24. Under their lobes are suspended the moon and the sun, as pendant ear-rings glittering over his cheeks. The mountain ranges called the lokáloka are fastened like chains around his waist.

25. The lightnings are the bracelets and armlets of Destiny, which move to and fro as she dances along. The clouds are her wrappers that fly about her in the air.

- 195104
195105 26. Death is furnished with many weapons, as clubs, axes, missiles, 195106 spears, shovels, mallets and sharp swords, all of which are sure 195107 weapons of destruction.
195108
195109 27. Mundane enjoyments are no other than long ropes dropped down by the 195110 hand of death, and keeping all mankind fast bound to the world; while 195111 the great thread of infinity (_ananta_) is worn by him as his wreath of 195112 flowers.
195113
195114 28. The belts of the seven oceans are worn about the arms of Death as 195115 his bracelets resplendent with the living sea-animals, and the bright 195116 gems contained in their depths.
195117
195118 29. The great vortices of customs, the successions of joy and grief, 195119 the excess of pride and the darkness of passions, form the streaks of 195120 hair on his body.
195121
195122 30. After the end of the world, he ceases to dance, and creates anew 195123 all things from the lowest animal that lives in the earth, to the 195124 highest Brahmá and Siva (when he resumes his dance).
195125
195126 31. Destiny as an actress, acts by turns her parts of creation and 195127 destruction, diversified by scenes of old age, sorrow and misery.
195128
195129 32. Time repeatedly creates the worlds and their woods, with the 195130 different abodes and localities teeming with population. He forms
195131 the moveable and immovable substances, establishes customs and again
195132 dissolves them, as boys make their dolls of clay and break them soon
195133 afterwards.

195138 CHAPTER XXVI.
195139

195140 THE ACTS OF DESTINY.
195141

195142
195143 Ráma said:—Such being the all destructive conduct of time and others
195144 (as already described), what confidence, O great sage, can men like me, 195145 have upon them?
195146

195147 2. We all remain here, O sage! as slaves sold to Fate and Destiny, and 195148 are deceived by their allurements as beasts of the forest.
195149

195150 3. This Fate whose conduct is so very inhuman, is always up to devour 195151 all beings, and is incessantly throwing men into the sea of troubles.
195152

195153 4. He is led by his malicious attempts to inflame the mind with 195154 inordinary desires, as the fire raises its flames to burn down a 195155 habitation.
195156

195157 5. Destiny the faithful and obedient wife of Fate, is naturally fickle 195158 on account of her being a female, and is always bent on mischief and 195159 disturbing the patience (even of the wisest of men).
195160

195161 6. As the heinous serpent feeds upon the air, so does cruel Death ever 195162 swallow the living. He ripens the body with old age to create his zest, 195163 and then devours all animals warm with life.
195164

195165 7. Death is called a relentless tyrant, having no pity even for the 195166 sick and weak; nor any regard for any one in any state of life.
195167

195168 8. Every one in this world is fond of affluence and pleasures, not 195169 knowing that these are only calculated to lead him to his ruin.
195170

195171 9. Life is very unsteady. Death is very cruel. Youth is very frail and 195172 fickle, and boyhood is full of dullness and insensibility.

10. Man is defiled by his worldliness, his friends are ties to the world, his enjoyments are the greatest of his diseases in life, and his avarice and ambition are the mirage that always allures him (to ruin).

11. Our very senses are our enemies, before which even truth appears as falsehood; the mind is the enemy of the mind and self is the enemy of self. (_i.e._ They are all deceptive).

12. Self-esteem is stained (with the name of selfishness), intelligence is blamed for its fallaciousness, our actions are attended with bad results, and our pleasures tend only to effeminacy.

13. All our desires are directed to enjoyments; our love of truth is lost; our women are the ensigns of vice, and all that were once so sweet, have become tasteless and vapid.

14. Things that are not real, are believed as real, and have become the cause of our pride, by hardening us in untruth, and keeping us from the light of truth.

15. My mind is at a loss to think what to do; it regrets at its increased appetite for pleasure, and for want of that self-denial (which I require).

16. My sight is dimmed by the dust of sensuality: the darkness of self-esteem prevails upon me: the purity of mind is never reached to, and truth is far off from me.

17. Life is become uncertain and death is always advancing nigh; my patience is disturbed, and there is an increased appetite for whatever is false.

18. The mind is soiled by dullness, and the body is cloyed with surfeit and ready to fall; old age exults over the body, and sins are conspicuous at every step.

19. Youth flies fast away with all our care to preserve it; the company of the good is at a distance; the light of truth shines from no where; and I can have recourse to nothing in this world.

20. The mind is stupified within itself, and its contentment has fled from it: there is no rise of enlightened sentiments in it, and meanness makes its advance to it from a distance.

21. Patience is converted into impatience; man is liable to the states of birth and death; good company is rare, but bad company is ever within the reach of every body.

22. All individual existences are liable to appear and disappear; all desires are chains to the world, and all worldly beings are ever seen to be led away perforce where no body can tell.

23. What reliance can there be on human life, when the points of the compass become indistinct and undiscernible; when the countries and places change their positions and names, and when mountains even are liable to be dilapidated?

24. What reliance can there be on man, when the heavens are swallowed in infinity, when this world is absorbed in nothingness, and the very earth loses her stability?

25. What reliance can there be on men like ourselves, when the very seas are liable to be dried up, when the stars are doomed to fade away and disappear, and when the most perfect of beings are liable to dissolution?

26. What reliance can there be on men like us, when even the demigods are liable to destruction, when the polar star is known to change its place, and when the immortal gods are doomed to mortality?

27. What reliance can there be on men like us, when Indra is doomed to be defeated by demons; when even death is hindered from his aim, and when the current air ceases to breathe?

28. What reliance can there be on men like us, when the very moon is to vanish with the sky, when the very sun is to be split into pieces, and when fire itself is to become frigid and cold?

29. What reliance can there be on men like us, when the very Hari and Brahmá are to be absorbed into the Great One, and when Siva himself is to be no more.

30. What reliance can there be on men like us, when the duration of time comes to be counted, when Destiny is destined to her final destiny, and when all vacuity loses itself in infinity?

31. That which is inaudible, unspeakable, invisible, and unknowable in his real form, displays to us these wondrous worlds by some fallacy (in our conceptions).

32. No one conscious of himself (his egoism), can disown his subjection to that Being, that dwells in the hearts of every one.

33. This sun—the lord of worlds, is impelled (by that power) to run over hills, rocks and fields, like an inert piece of stone, hurled down from a mountain and borne away by a current stream.

34. This globe of earth, the seat of all the Suras and Asuras, and surrounded by the luminous sphere in the manner of a walnut covered by its hard crust, subsists under His command.

35. The gods in the heavens, the men on earth and the serpents in the nether world, are brought into existence and led to decay by His will only.

36. Káma (Cupid) that is arbitrarily powerful, and has forcibly overpowered on all the living world, has derived his unconquerable might from the Lord of worlds.

37. As the heated elephant regales the air with his spirituous exudation, so does the spring perfume the air with his profusion of flowers, unsettling the minds of men (at the will of the Almighty).

38. So are the loose glances of loving damsels directed to inflict deep wounds in the heart of man, which his best reason is unable to heal.

39. One whose best endeavour is always to do good to others, and who feels for others' woes, is really intelligent and happy under the influence of his cool judgment.

40. Who can count the number of beings resembling the waves of the ocean, and on whom death has been darting the submarine fire of destruction.

41. All mankind are deluded to entrap themselves in the snare of avarice, and to be afflicted with all evils in life, as the deer entangled in the thickets of a jungle.

42. The term of human life in this world, is decreased in each generation in proportion to (the increase of their wicked acts). The desire of fruition is as vain as the expectation of reaping fruits from a creeper growing in the sky: yet I know not why men of reason would not understand this truth.

43. This is a day of festivity, a season of joy and a time of procession. Here are our friends, here the pleasures and here the variety of our entertainments. Thus do men of vacant minds amuse

195311 themselves with weaving the web of their desires, until they become 195312 extinct.

195313
195314
195315
195316
195317 CHAPTER XXVII.

195318
195319 VANITY OF THE WORLD.

195320
195321
195322 Rāma said:—O sage! this seemingly pleasing but actually unpleasant
195323 world, has nothing in it that is productive of such a thing as can 195324 afford tranquility to the soul.

195326 2. After the playful boyhood is over, the mind wastes itself in the 195327 society of women like the deer fallen in a cavern, then the body bends 195328 down under old age, and the man has only to grieve (for his folly).

195329
195330 3. As the body is stricken with the frost of old age, its beauty flies
195331 afar from it like the bloom of the fading lotus, and then the fountain
195332 of man's worldliness is at once dried up.

195333
195334 4. As the body gets towards its decline, so much doth death rejoice
195335 in it. The body grows lean with grey hairs upon the head, just as a 195336 creeper fades away with the flowers upon it.

195337
195338 5. All living creatures are borne away by the stream of avarice, which 195339 upsets the tree of contentment growing on the bank and flows on for 195340 ever in this world.

195341
195342 6. Human body is like a vessel covered with skin; and glides over the 195343 ocean of the world (without its helmsman of reason). It is tossed about 195344 by sensual pleasures, and goes down under the water by the pressure of 195345 its whale-like passions.

195346
195347 7. The world is a wilderness abounding in creepers of avarice and 195348 trees of sensuality, with hundreds of desires as their branches. Our 195349 minds like monkeys pass their time in roving about this forest without 195350 getting the fruits (they seek).

195351
195352 8. Those that do not yield to grief in troubles, that are not elated 195353 with prosperity, nor smitten at heart by women, are rare in this world.

195355 9. Those who fight boldly in the battle fields and withstand the 195356 war-elephants, are not so very brave in my opinion, as those who 195357 withstand the surges of the mind amidst the streams of carnal appetites.

195359 10. I see no such deeds in the world which endure to the last (or final 195360 emancipation) of men. Actions proceeding from a desire of fruition in 195361 fools, serve only for their restlessness on earth.

195362
195363 11. Such men are rare in the world, that have filled the corners of the 195364 world with their fame and valour, who have filled their houses with 195365 true riches acquired by honest means and an unwavering patience.

195366
195367 12. Good and bad fortune always overtake a man, even if he were living 195368 in an aperture of the rock or within the walls of mountains, or even if 195369 he were enclosed within an iron built closet.

195370
195371 13. Our sons and riches are mere objects of delight to us. It is as 195372 erroneous to suppose them to be of any good to us at the end, as to 195373 expect any benefit from the decoction of poison.

195374
195375 14. Old people being reduced to calamitous circumstances at the 195376 pitiable state of the decay of their bodies and decline of life, have 195377 greatly to be tormented at the thoughts of the impious deeds (of their 195378 past lives).

15. Men having passed their early days in the gratification of their desires and other worldly pursuits at the expense of the acts of virtue and piety, are as much troubled with anxieties at the end, that their minds are seized with a tremor like that of the plumage of a peacock shaken by the breeze. How then can a man attain to tranquility at any time?
16. Wealth whether forthcoming or unattainable, whether got by labour or given by fortune, is all as deceitful to the worldly minded, as the high waters of rivers (swelling only to subside).
17. That such and such desirable acts are to be done, are the constant thoughts of men, who desire to please their sons and wives, until they are worn out with age and become crazy in their minds.
18. Like leaves on trees that grow to fall, and falling make room for others to shoot forth, are those men who devoid of reason, die away daily to be born again.
19. Men having travelled here and there and far and near, return to their homes at the end of the day; but none of them can have rest by day or night, except the virtuous few that live by honest dealings.
20. After quelling his enemies and getting enough of riches in his clutches, the rich man just sits down to enjoy his gains; when death comes upon him, and interrupts his joy.
21. Seeing the vile trash of worldly gains earned and accumulated by the basest means to be but transitory, the infatuated mob do not perceive their approaching dissolution.
22. Men loving their own lives, and making mouths at the demise of others, are like a herd of sheep bound to the stake, and staring at the slaughter of their fellows, yet feeding themselves to fall as fattened victims to death.
23. The multitude of people on earth, is ever seen to appear in and disappear from it as fast as the passing waves of the sea, but who can tell whence they come and whither they return.
24. Women are as delicate as poisonous creepers, that with their red petaled lips and garments, and their eyes as busy as fluttering bees, are killers of mankind and stealers of their ravished hearts.
25. Men are as passengers in a procession, repairing from this side and that to join at the place of their meeting. Such is the delusive union of our wives and friends here (for our meeting in the next world).
26. As the burning and extinguishing of the lamp depend on the wick and its moistening oil; so does our course in this transitory world (depend on our acts and affections only). Nobody knows the true cause of this mysterious existence.
27. The revolution of the world is comparable with that of the potter's wheel and the floating bubbles of rain water; that appear to be lasting to the ignorant observer only.
28. The blooming beauty and graces (of youth), are destined to be snatched away at the approach of old age. The youthful hopes also of men fly at a distance like the bloom of lotus buds in winter.
29. The tree which is ordained to be useful to mankind by the loads of fruits and flowers that it bears upon its body, is fated also to be hewn down by the cruel axe at last. How then can beneficent men expect to avoid the cruel hand of death.
30. Society with relatives is (of all others) as perilous as that of a poisonous plant; it is pleasant for its domestic affections, which are in reality but delusions of the soul.

- 195449
195450 31. What is that thing in the world, which has no fault in it; and what 195451 is that which does not afflict or grieve us; what being is born that 195452 is not subjected to death, and what are those acts that are free from 195453 deceit?
- 195454
195455 32. Those living a _Kalpa_ age are reckoned as short-lived, compared 195456 with those living for many _Kalpas_, and they again are so in respect 195457 to Brahmá. Hence the parts of time being all finite, the ideas of their 195458 length or shortness are altogether false.
- 195459
195460 33. Things that are called mountains are made of rocks, those that are 195461 called trees are made of wood, and those that are made of flesh are 195462 called animals, and man is the best of them. But they are all made of 195463 matter, and doomed to death and decay.
- 195464
195465 34. Many things appear to be endued with intelligence, and the heavenly 195466 bodies seem to be full of water; but physicists have found out by 195467 analysis that, there is no other thing any where except (_minutiæ of_) 195468 matter.
- 195469
195470 35. It is no wonder that this (unreal world) should appear a miraculous 195471 (reality) to the wise, and seem marvelously striking in the minds 195472 of mankind; since the visions in our dreams also appear so very 195473 fascinating to every one in their state of dreaming.
- 195474
195475 36. Those that are corrupted in their greediness (after worldly 195476 enjoyments), will not even in their old age, receive the sermons on 195477 their eternal concerns, which they think to be false chimeras as those 195478 of a flower or a creeper growing in the sky.
- 195479
195480 37. People are still deluded in their minds in wishing to attain the 195481 state of their superiors; but they fall down still lower like beasts 195482 (goats) from the top of a hill, in wishing to lay hold on the fruits of 195483 a verdant creeper out of their reach.
- 195484
195485 38. Young men spending their wealth in personal gratifications, are 195486 as useless as plants growing in the bowels of a deep and inaccessible 195487 cavern, which spread their fruits and flowers, leaves and branches and 195488 their shades to the use of nobody.
- 195489
195490 39. Men are found to resemble the black antelopes (in their 195491 wanderings): some of them roving about the sweet, soft and beautiful 195492 sceneries of the country, and others roaming in sterile tracts and 195493 parts of boundless forests. (_i.e._ Some living in the society of men, 195494 and others as recluses from it).
- 195495
195496 40. The daily and diversified acts of nature are all pernicious in 195497 their nature; they appear pleasant and ravishing to the heart for a 195498 time, but are attained with pain in the end, and fill the mind of the 195499 wise with dismay.
- 195500
195501 41. Man is addicted to greediness, and is prone to a variety of wicked 195502 shifts and plots; a good man is not now to be seen even in a dream, and 195503 there is no act which is free from difficulty. I know not how to pass 195504 this state of human life.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

MUTABILITY OF THE WORLD.

Ráma said:—

Whatever we see of all moveable or immovable things in this world, they are all as evanescent as things viewed in a dream.

195518

195519 2. The hollow desert that appears as the dried bed of a sea to-day, 195520 will be found to-morrow to be a running flood by the accumulation of 195521 rain-water in it.

195523 3. What is to-day a mountain reaching the sky and with extensive 195524 forests on it, is in course of time levelled to the ground, and is 195525 afterwards dug into pit.

195527 4. The body that is clothed to-day with garments of silk, and decorated 195528 with garlands and fragrance, is to be cast away naked into a ditch 195529 to-morrow.

195531 5. What is seen to be a city to-day, and busy with the bustle of 195532 various occupations, passes in course of a few days into the condition
195533 of an uninhabited wilderness.

195534

195535 6. The man who is very powerful to-day and presides over 195536 principalities, is reduced in a few days to a heap of ashes.

195537

195538 7. The very forest which is so formidable to-day and appears as blue 195539 as the azure skies, turns to be a city in the course of time, with its 195540 banners hoisted in the air.

195541

195542 8. What is (to-day) a formidable jungle of thick forests, turns in time
195543 to be a table-land as on the mount Meru.

195544

195545 9. Water becomes land and land becomes water. Thus the world composed 195546 of wood, grass and water becomes otherwise with all its contents in 195547 course of time.

195549 10. Our boyhood and youth, bodies and possessions are all but transient 195550 things, and they change from one state to another, as the ever 195551 fluctuating waves of the ocean.

195552

195553 11. Our lives in this (mortal) world, are as unsteady as the flame of a 195554 lamp placed at the window, and the splendour of all the objects in the 195555 three worlds, is as flickering as the flashing of the lightning.

195556

195557 12. As a granary stored with heaps of grains is exhausted by its 195558 continued waste, so is the stock of life spent away by its repeated 195559 respirations.

195561 13. The mind of man is as fluctuating as a flag waving in the air and 195562 filled with the dust of sin, to indicate its wavering between the paths
195563 of heaven and hell.

195564

195565 14. The existence of this delusive world, is as the appearance of an 195566 actress on the stage, shuffling her vests as she trudges along in her 195567 dancing.

195569 15. It's scenes are as changeful and fascinating as those of a magic 195570 city; and its dealings as bewitching and momentary as the glances of a 195571 juggling girl.

195573 16. The stage of the world presents us a scene of continued dancing
195574 (of the sorceress of deception), and the deceptive glances of her eyes 195575 resembling the fleeting flashes of lightning.

195577 17. The days, the great men, their hey-days and deeds (that are past 195578 and gone), are now retained in our memory only, and such must be our 195579 cases also in a short time.

195581 18. Many things are going to decay and many coming anew day by day;
195582 and there is yet no end of this accursed course of events in this 195583 ever-changeful world.

195585 19. Men degenerate into lower animals, and those again rise to humanity 195586 (by metempsychosis), gods become no-gods, and there is nothing that remains the same.

20. The sun displays every thing to light by his rays, and watches over the rotations of days and nights, to witness like time the dissolution of all things.

21. The gods Brahmá, Vishnu and Siva and all material productions, are reduced to nothingness, like the submarine fire subsiding under the waters of the deep.

22. The heaven, the earth, the air, the sky, the mountains, the rivers, and all the quarters of the globe, are subject to destruction like the dry fuel by the all-destroying fire of the last day.

23. Riches and relatives, friends, servants and affluence, are of no pleasure to him who is in constant dread of death.

24. All these are so long delightful to a sensible man, as the monster of death does not appear before the eye of his mind.

25. We have prosperity at one moment, succeeded by adversity at another; so we have health at one time, followed by sickness soon after.

26. What intelligent being is there, that is not misled by these delusions of the world, which represent things otherwise than what they are, and serve to bewilder the mind?

27. (The world is as varying) as the face of the skies; it is now as black as dark clay, and in the next moment bright with the golden hues of fair light.

28. It is now over-cast by azure clouds resembling the blue lotuses of the lake, and roaring loudly for a time and then being dumb and silent on a sudden:

29. Now studded with stars, and now glowing with the glory of the sun; then graced by the pleasant moonbeams, and at last without any light at all.

30. Who is there so sedate and firm, that is not terrified at these sudden appearances and their disappearance, and the momentary durations and final dissolution of worldly things?

31. What is the nature of this world, where we are overtaken by adversity at one moment, and elated by prosperity at another, where one is born at a time, and dies away at another?

32. One that was something else before, is born as a man in this life, and is changed to another state in course of a few days; thus there is no being that remains steadily in the same state.

33. A pot is made of clay, and cloth is made of cotton, and they are still the same dull materials of which they are composed: thus there is nothing new in this world that was not seen or known before, and that changes not its form. (_i.e._ All is but a formal and no material change).

34. The acts of creation and destruction, of diffusion, production, and sustentation follow one another, as the revolution of day and night to man.

35. It happens sometimes, that an impotent man slays a hero, and that hundreds are killed by one individual; so also a commoner becomes a noble man, and thus every thing is changeful in this varying world.

36. These bodies of men that are always changing their states, are as bodies of waters rising and falling in waves by motion of the winds.

37. Boyhood lasts but a few days, and then it is succeeded by youth which is as quickly followed by old age: thus there being no identity of the same person, how can one rely on the uniformity of external objects?

38. The mind that gets delighted in a moment and becomes dejected in the next, and assumes likewise its equanimity at another, is indeed as changeful as an actor.

39. The creator who is ever turning one thing into another in his work of creation, is like a child who makes and breaks his doll without concern.

40. The actions of producing and collecting (of grains), of feeding (one's self) and destroying (others), come by turns to mankind like the rotation of day and night.

41. Neither adversity nor prosperity is of long continuance in the case of worldly people, but they are ever subject to appearance and disappearance by turns.

42. Time is a skilful player and plays many parts with ease; but he is chiefly skilled in tragedy, and often plays his tragic part in the affairs of men.

43. All beings are produced as fruits in the great forest of the universe, by virtue of their good and bad acts (of past lives): and time like a gust of wind blasts them day by day before their maturity.

CHAPTER XXIX.

UNRELIABLENESS OF WORLDLY THINGS.

Thus is my heart consumed by the wild-fire of those great worldly evils, and there rises in me no desire of enjoying them, as there rises no mirage from a lake.

2. My existence upon earth gets bitter day by day, and though I have got some experience in it, yet its associations have made me as sour as the Nimba plant by its immersion in water.

3. I see wickedness on the increase, and righteousness on the decline in the mind of man, which like the sour Karanja (crab) fruit, becomes sourer every day.

4. I see honour is eaten up every day by mutual altercations of men, using harsh words to each other as they crack the nuts under their teeth.

5. Too much eagerness for royalty and worldly enjoyments, is equally prejudicial to our welfare; as we loose our future prospects by the former, and our present happiness by the latter.

6. I take no delight in my gardens nor have any pleasure in women; I feel no joy at the prospect of riches, but enjoy my solace in my own heart and mind.

7. Frail are the pleasures of the world, and avarice is altogether intolerable; the bustle of business has broken down my heart, and (I know not) where to have my tranquility.

8. Neither do I hail death nor am I in love with my life; but remain as I do, devoid of all anxiety and care.

9. What have I to do with a kingdom and with all its enjoyments? Of 195725 what avail are riches to me, and what is the end of all our exertions?

195726 All these are but requirements of self-love, from which I am entirely 195727 free.

195728
195729 10. The chain of (repeated) births is a bond that binds fast all men 195730 by its strong knots of the senses; those striving to break loose from 195731 this bondage for their liberation, are (said to be) the best of men.

195732
195733 11. These haughty damsels whom the god of love employs to ravage the 195734 hearts of men, resemble a group of elephants subverting a lotus bed
195735 under their feet.

195737 12. The treatment of the mind with pure reason being neglected now (in 195738 youth), it is hard to heal it afterwards (in age), when it admits of no 195739 cure.

195740
195741 13. It is the worldliness of man that is his true poison, while real 195742 poison is no poison to him. It is the poison of worldliness which 195743 destroys his future life, while real poison is only locally injurious 195744 to him (in his present state).

195745
195746 14. Neither pleasure nor pain, nor friends nor relatives, nor even life 195747 and death, can enchain (affect) the mind that has received the light of 195748 truth.

195749
195750 15. Teach me, Oh Bráhmaṇ! that art the best of the learned in the 195751 mysteries of the past and future, teach me so that I may soon become 195752 like one devoid of grief and fear and worldly troubles, and may have 195753 the light of truth beaming upon me.

195754
195755 16. The forest of ignorance is laid over with the snare of desire, 195756 it is full of the thorns of misery, and is the dreadful seat of 195757 destruction and the danger (of repeated births and deaths).

195758
195759 17. I can rather suffer myself to be put under the jaws of death with 195760 his rows of teeth like saws, but cannot bear the dreadly pains of 195761 worldly cares and anxieties.

195762
195763 18. It is a gloomy error in this world to think that I have this and 195764 have not the other; it serves to toss about our minds as a gust of wind
195765 disperses the dust of the earth.

195766
195767 19. It is the thread of avarice that links together all living beings
195768 like a chaplet of pearls; the mind serves to twirl about this chain, 195769 but pure consciousness sits quiet to observe its rotation.

195770
195771 20. I who am devoid of desires, would like to break this ornamental 195772 chain of worldliness, hanging about me as a deadly serpent, in the 195773 same manner, as a lion breaks asunder the net (which is laid to ensnare 195774 him).

195775
195776 21. Do you now, O most learned sage, scatter the mist which has 195777 overspread the forest of my heart, and the darkness which has overcast
195778 my mind, by the light of true knowledge.

195779
195780 22. There are no anxieties, O sage! which cannot be put to an end by 195781 the society of good minded men; the darkness of night can be well 195782 removed by moon-beams.

195783
195784 23. Life is as fickle as a drop of water pending on a mass of clouds 195785 blown away by the winds. Our enjoyments are as unsteady as the 195786 lightning that flickers in the midst of clouds. The pleasures of youth 195787 are as slippery as water. With these reflections in my mind, I have 195788 subdued them all under the province of peace and tranquility.

SELF-DISPARAGEMENT.

Seeing the world thus ingulphed amidst the abyss of hundreds of rising dangers and difficulties, my mind is immersed in the mire of anxieties.

2. My mind is wandering everywhere and I am struck with fear at every thing; my limbs are shaking with fear like the leaves of a withered tree.

3. My mind is bewildered by impatience for its want of true contentment, just as a young woman is afraid in a desert for want of the company of her strong handed husband.

4. The thoughts of my mind are entangled in my desire for worldly enjoyments, as stags are caught in the pit strewn with grass over it.

5. The senses of an unreasonable man, ever run astray to the wrong and never turn to the right way; so the eyes of a blind man lead him but to fall into the pit.

6. Human thoughts are linked to the animal soul as consorts to their lords. They can neither sit idle nor ramble at liberty, but must remain as wives under the control of their husbands.

7. My patience is almost worn out, like that of a creeper under the winter frost. It is decayed, and neither lives nor perishes at once.

8. Our minds are partly settled in worldly things, and partly fixed in their giver (the Supreme soul). This divided state of the mind is termed its half waking condition.

9. My mind is in a state of suspense, being unable to ascertain the real nature of my soul. I am like one in the dark, who is deceived by the stump of a fallen tree at a distance, to think it a human figure.

10. Our minds are naturally fickle and wandering all about the earth. They cannot forsake their restlessness, as the vital airs cannot subsist without their motion.

11. Tell me Oh sage, what is that state of life which is dignified above others, which is unassociated with the troubles (incident to birth and death), unqualified by the conditions of humanity, and apart from errors, and wherein griefs are unknown.

12. (Tell me also) how Janaka and the other good men, who are conspicuous for their ceremonious acts, and distinguished for their good conduct, have acquired their excellence (in holy knowledge).

13. (Tell me likewise) Oh source of my honor, how a man, who is besmeared all over his body with the dirt of worldliness, may yet be cleansed and get rid of it.

14. Tell me what is that knowledge, by resorting to which, the serpents of worldliness, may be freed from their worldly crookedness, and become straight in their conduct.

15. Tell me how the foulness of my heart may regain its clearness, after it is so much soiled by errors and tainted with evils, like a lake disturbed by elephants and polluted with dirt.

16. How is it possible for one engaged in the affairs of the world, to be untainted with its blemishes, and remain as pure and intact as a drop of water on the lotus leaf.

17. How may one attain his excellence by dealing with others as with himself, and minding the goods of others as straws, and by remaining aloof from love.

18. Who is that great man that has got over the great ocean of the world, whose exemplary conduct (if followed) exempts one from misery.
19. What is the best of things that ought to be pursued after, and what is that fruit which is worth obtaining? Which is the best course of life in this inconsistent world.
20. Tell me the manner by which I may have a knowledge of the past and future events of the world, and the nature of the unsteady works of its creator.
21. Do so, that my mind which is as the moon in the sky of my heart, may be cleared of its impurities.
22. Tell me what thing is most delectable to the mind, and what most abominable to it; as also how this fickle and inconstant mind may get its fixedness like that of a rock.
23. Tell me what is that holy charm, which can remove this cholic pain of worldliness, that is attended with numberless troubles.
24. Tell me how can I entertain within my heart, the blossoms of the arbor of heavenly happiness, that sheds about it the coolness of the full-moon beams.
25. Oh ye good men! that are present and learned in divine knowledge, teach me so that I may obtain the fullness of my heart, and may not come to grief and sorrow any more.
26. My mind is devoid of that tranquility which results chiefly from holy happiness, and is perplexed with endless doubts, that disturb my peace as the dogs molest smaller animals in the desert.

CHAPTER XXXI.

QUERIES OF RÁMA.

Ráma said:—I have no reliance on the durability of life, which is as transient as a drop of water that sticks to the point of a shaking leaf on a lofty tree; and as short as the cusp of the moon on Siva's forehead.

2. I have no credit in the durability of life, which is transient as the swelling that take place in the pouch of a frog while it croaks in the meadow. Nor have I any trust in the company of friends, which are as dangerous as the treacherous snare of hunters.

3. What can we do under the misty cloud of error (overhanging our minds), and raising our tempestuous desires which flash forth in lightnings of ambition, and burst out in the thunder claps of selfishness?

4. How shall we save ourselves from the temptations of our desires dancing like peacocks (and displaying their gaudy train) around us; and from the bustle of the world breaking in upon us as thickly as the blossoms of the _Kurchi_ plant.

5. How can we fly from the clutches of cruel Fate, who like a cat kills the living as poor mice, and falls unwearied and unexpectedly upon his prey in the twinkling of an eye.

6. What expedient, what course, what reflections, and what refuge must we have recourse to, in order to avoid the unknown tracks of future lives?

195932
195933 7. There is nothing so trifling in this earth below, or in the heavens
195934 above, which ye gifted men cannot raise to consequence.
195935

195936 8. How can this accursed, troublesome and vapid world, be relished by 195937 one unless he is infatuated by ignorance?
195938

195939 9. It is the fusion of desires, which produces the milky beverage of 195940 contentment, and fills the earth with delights as the spring adorns it 195941 with flowers.
195942

195943 10. Tell me O sage, how the mist of our desires, which darkens the moon
195944 of our intellects, is to be dispelled from our minds, so as to make it 195945 shine forth in its full brightness.
195946

195947 11. How are we to deal in this wilderness of the world, knowing well 195948 that it is destructive both of our present and future interest?
195949

195950 12. What man is there that moves about in this ocean of the earth, who 195951 has not to buffet in the waves of his passions and diseases, and the 195952 currents of his enjoyments and prosperity.
195953

195954 13. Tell me, O thou best of sages, how one may escape unburnt like 195955 mercury (in its chemical process), when fallen upon the furnace of the 195956 earth.
195957

195958 14. (How can one get rid of the world) when it is impossible for him 195959 to avoid dealing in it, in the same manner as it is not possible for 195960 aquatic animals to live without their native element.
195961

195962 15. Our good deeds even are not devoid (of their motives) of affection 195963 and hatred, pleasure and pain, similarly as no flame of fire is 195964 unaccompanied by its power of burning.
195965

195966 16. As it is not possible to restrain the mind from thinking on worldly 195967 matters, without the process of right reasoning, deign to communicate 195968 to me therefore, the dictates of sound reason for my guidance.
195969

195970 17. Give me the best instruction for warding off the miseries (of the 195971 world), either by my dealing with or renouncing (the affairs of life).
195972

195973 18. Tell me of that man of enlightened understanding who had attained
195974 to the highest state of holiness and tranquility of his mind of yore, 195975 and the deeds and manner by which he achieved the same.
195976

195977 19. Tell me good sir, how the saints (of old) fled out of the reach
195978 of misery, that I may learn the same for suppression of my erroneous 195979 conceptions.
195980

195981 20. Or if there be no such precept (as I am <in> need of) in existence, 195982 or being _in esse_, it is not to be revealed to me by any body.
195983

195984 21. And should I fail of myself (by intuition) to attain that highest 195985 state of tranquility, then I must remain inactive (as I am), and avoid 195986 my sense of egoism altogether.
195987

195988 22. I will refrain from eating and drinking even of water, and from 195989 clothing myself with apparels; I will cease from all my actions of 195990 bathing and making my offerings, as also from my diet and the like.
195991

195992 23. I will attend to no duty, nor care about prosperity or calamity. I 195993 will be free from all desires except that of the abandonment of this 195994 body.
195995

195996 24. I must remain aloof from all fears and sympathies, from selfish 195997 feelings and emulation, and continue to sit quietly as a figure in 195998 painting.
195999

196000 25. I will gradually do away with the inspiration and respiration of my

196001 breath and outward sensations; till I part with this trifle—the seat
196002 all of troubles—this the so called body.

196003
196004 26. I do not belong to this body, nor does it belong to me, nor is any 196005 thing else mine; I shall be null and void like the oil-less lamp, and 196006 abandon every thing with this body.

196007
196008 27. Válmíki said:—Then Ráma who was as lovely as the moon, and 196009 whose mind was well fraught with reasoning, became silent before the 196010 assemblage of the eminent men, as the peacock ceases from his screaming 196011 before the gathering clouds in awe.

196012
196013
196014
196015
196016 CHAPTER XXXII.

196017
196018 PRAISES ON RÁMA'S SPEECH.

196019
196020
196021 Válmíki said:—When the prince Ráma (having his eyes resembling the 196022 petals of a lotus), had concluded his speech calculated to remove all 196023 ignorance from the mind.

196024
196025 2. All the men in the assembly had their eyes beaming forth with 196026 wonder, and the hairs on their bodies stood erect and pierced through 196027 their garments, as if wishing to hear the speech.

196028
196029 3. The assembly seemed for a moment to have lost their worldly desires 196030 in their eagerness after a stoic indifference, and to be rolling in the 196031 sea of nectar.

196032
196033 4. The audience remained (motionless) as the figures in a painting, 196034 being enraptured with internal delight at hearing the sweet words of 196035 the fortunate Ráma.

196036
196037 5. There were Vasishtha and Viswámित्रा with other sages, and the prime 196038 minister Jayanta and other counsellors (of the king) then seated in 196039 that assembly.

196040
196041 6. There were also king Dasaratha and his subordinate rajas, with the 196042 citizens and foreign delegates, the chieftains and princes, together
196043 with Bráhmans and men learned in the Vedas and divine knowledge.

196044
196045 7. These accompanied by their friends and allies, with the birds in the 196046 cages and the royal antelopes and steeds of sport (about the palace), 196047 listened to Ráma with fixed and mute attention.

196048
196049 8. There were likewise the queen Kausalyá and other ladies adorned with 196050 their best jewels, and seated at the windows, all mute and motionless.

196051
196052 9. Besides these the birds on the trees and creepers of the princely
196053 pleasure garden, were listening to Ráma without fluttering their wings
196054 or making any motion or sound.

196055
196056 10. There were the Siddhas and ærial beings, and the tribes of 196057 Gandharvas and Kinnaras, together with Nárada, Vyása and Pulapa the 196058 chiefs of sages (present at that place).

196059
196060 11. There were also some of the gods and chiefs of gods, Vidyádhara
196061 and the Nágas, who heard the speech of Ráma which was full of meaning 196062 and clearness.

196064 12. As Ráma whose eyes were beautiful as the lotus, whose face was 196065 as lovely as the moon, and who likened the nocturnal luminary in the 196066 atmosphere of Raghu's family, held his silence.

196067
196068 13. Flowers were cast upon him from heaven in showers by the hands of 196069 the divine personages with their loud cheers and blessings.

14. The people in the assembly were highly regaled with the sweet scent and beauty of these flowers of paradise fraught with humming bees in their cells.
15. These flowers when blown in the air by the breeze of heaven, appeared as they were clusters of stars, which after their fall brightened the ground with their beauty as with the beaming smiles of heavenly maids.
16. They appeared in the form of rain drops falling from the clouds, and blazing by the light of mute lightnings, and scattering about like balls of fresh butter.
17. They resembled also as particles of snow-balls, or as the grains of a necklace of pearls or as beams of moon-light, or as the little billows of the sea of milk, or like drops of ice-cream.
18. There were also borne by the loose and sweet winds of heaven, some lotuses with long filaments, and attended by clusters of bees humming and flying about them.
19. There were also to be seen heaps of ketaki and Kairava, Kunda and blue lotus flowers, falling and shining brightly among them.
20. These flowers covered the court hall and the roofs of houses and their courtyards. The men and women in the city raised their heads to behold them falling.
21. The sky was quite unclouded when the flowers fell incessantly from above. A sight like this that was never seen before struck the people with wonder.
22. The shower of flowers fell for quarter of an hour, but the Siddhas from whose hands they fell were unseen all the while.
23. The falling of the flowers having ceased after the assembly was covered with them, they heard the following words, coming to them from the divine personages in the sky.
24. "We have been travelling every where in whole bodies of the Siddhas from the beginning of creation; but never have we heard any where so sweet a speech as this.
25. "Such a magnanimous speech of indifference as has been just now spoken by Ráma—the moon of Raghu's race, was never heard even by gods like ourselves.
26. "We account ourselves truly blessed to hear this highly charming and wondrous speech from the mouth of Ráma himself to-day.
27. "Indeed we are awakened and edified by attending diligently to this truly excellent speech, delivered by Ráma on the ambrosial bliss of asceticism, and leading to the highest felicity of men".

CHAPTER XXXIII.

ASSOCIATION OF AERIAL AND EARTHLY BEINGS.

The Siddhas said:—

It behoves us to hear the decision of the great sages, in reply to the holy sermon, already delivered by the chief of Raghu's race.

2. Come forward you great chiefs of the sages, you Nárada, Vyása, Pulaha and all ye great sages, and be ready (to hear).

3. Let us descend to the full open court of Dasaratha, which is as bright as gold and free from stain, in the manner of bees alighting on the aureate and immaculate lotus.

4. Válmiki said:-

So saying, the whole company of divine sages alighted themselves in that court from their aerial abode.

5. There Nárada the chief of sages, sat foremost playing on his lute, and in the midst was Vyása, with his dark blue complexion resembling a rainy cloud.

6. It was more over adorned with the presence of the chief sages Bhrigu, Angiras, Pulastya and others, with Chyavana, Uddálaka, Usira, Saraloman and many more about them.

7. Their garments of deer skins hang loosely down as they embraced one another. Their beads of _rudráksha_ moved in one hand, and their water pots shook in the other.

8. Their bodies shed a lustre in the Court-hall, resembling the yellow light of the stars in the sky, and like the beams of so many suns blazing upon one another.

9. They appeared as a shower of moon beams or as a halo about the full moon, or as a circle about the orb of the sun out of its season.

10. They looked like a circlet of gems of varied colors, or like a belt of pearls of great lustre.

11. Vyása appeared at the place where he sat, to be as a dark cloud amidst the stars; and Nárada was beheld upon his seat as the white orb of the moon amongst the starry group.

12. Here Pulastya shone as Indra among the gods, and there Angirá blazed as the sun amidst the heavenly bodies.

13. On seeing the body of Siddhas descending from the sky on earth, the whole court of king Dasaratha rose up (to greet them).

14. There was a promiscuous assemblage of the aerial and earthly sages, whose commingled glory spread a lustre to the ten sides of the Court.

15. Some of them held bamboo sticks in their hands, and others had lotuses in theirs. Some had put the sacred grass in their crests, while others had inserted some gems to the braids of their hair.

16. Some had matted and tawny brown hairs on their heads, and others wore garlands of flowers on theirs. Some had strings of beads for their bracelets and others wore wristlets made of the jasmine flowers.

17. Some were clothed in tatters, and others wore garments made of bark, while there were others who wore raiments of silk. Some were girt with girdles of grass and skin about their waists, and others wore waist bands with pendant strings of pearl.

18. Vasishtha and Viswámitra honoured the aerials one by one; with respectful offerings and water and courteous address.

19. The great body of the etherials also honored Vasistha and Viswámitra in their turn, with water and offerings worthy of them and with polite speeches.

20. The king also honoured the gods and the body of the Siddhas, who in return greeted the monarch with inquiries about his welfare.

21. Then the heavenly and earthly saints interchanged their greetings with one another with cordial welcomes and gestures, and were all seated afterwards on seats made of the _kusa_ grass.

22. They next honoured Ráma, who lay bowing before them, with gentle words and congratulations accompanied with shedding of flowers.

23. There were seated in that assembly the sages:—Viswámitra, Vasishtha, Váma Deva and the ministers of state.

24. There were also Nárada, the son of Brahmá, Vyása the greatest of sages, Maríchi, Durvása and Angirá.

25. There were Kratu, Pulastya, Pulaha, Saraloma, the great sage Vátsáyana, Bharadwája, Válmíki the great bard and sage.

26. There were also Uddálaka, Richika, Sarjati as well as Chyavana.

27. These and many others versed in the Vedas and their branches, and knowing all things worth knowing, were the leading members (of the assembly).

28. Then Nárada and others joined with Viswámitra and Vasishtha in addressing Ráma, who was sitting silent with his face turned downwards; and said:—

29. We admire the blest and graceful speech of the prince which is dignified with the spirit of stoicism that breathes through the whole of it.

30. It is full of thought, perspicuous, elegant, clear, dignified, sweet and worthy of noble minded men, by its lucid style and wants of faults.

31. Who is there that is not struck with admiration at the speech of Ráma? It is well expressive of his thoughts, correct in its diction plain and sweet and agreeable to all:

32. It is rare to find one man among a hundred who is so eloquent as to combine dignity and force with a clearness and sweetness, that may command the admiration of all.

33. Who has such a clear head as our prince, a head which is as penetrating as the best pointed arrow, and as fruitful and beauteous as the creeping plant.

34. He is truly a man whose intellectual light like that of Ráma's, burns as the flame of a lamp within himself and enlightens all about him.

35. Man's blood, flesh, and bones with other (parts of his body) serve as machines to supply him with sensations of external object; but there is no intelligence in them.

36. Life and death, old age and troubles, repeatedly overtake every man; but they are beasts who are so infatuated as never to think of these.

37. There is scarcely any man to be seen, who is of so clear an understanding as Ráma (the destroyer of his enemies), who is able to judge of the future by the past.

38. Ráma is the most excellent, admirable, useful, and well shaped person amongst men, as is the mango tree (in the vegetable world).

39. It is only to-day that we see that a man of Ráma's age has acquired so much experience of the world, and such extraordinarily mature an understanding.

40. There are many such trees found growing in every place as are beautiful to see, easy of ascent, abundant in flowers and leaves; but there is no tree of paradise growing on earth.

41. There may grow in every forest, trees with goodly flowers and leaves; but the extraordinary and fair clove tree is not always to be met with.

42. Ráma has displayed the wonder of his knowledge, as the moon displays her cooling beams and good trees their clusters of blossoms, and as the flowers diffuse their fragrance all about.

43. It is very difficult to get the essence of true knowledge in this accursed world, which is constructed by the ungovernable and dominant predestination (of our past acts for misleading us to error and misery).

44. Those only are reckoned the best of men, and leaders of the good, who try their best to gain the essence of truth, and whose minds are fixed on glory as their best treasure.

45. We do not see any one in all this world, who is equal to Ráma in discrimination and magnanimity; nor shall there be one like him in future. This is our firm conviction.

46. If this speech of Ráma, which has filled every one here with admiration, fail to get its reply to the satisfaction of Ráma's mind, it is certain that all of us here, must pass for senseless sages (on earth).

MUMUKSHU KHANDA

OR

THE MEANS OF FINAL LIBERATION.

CHAPTER I.

_Liberation of Sukadeva._

After Ráma had delivered his speech in an audible voice before the assembly, he was tenderly accosted by the sage Viswámitra who sat before him; saying:—

2. Ráma! that art the best of the most intelligent, and hast nothing more to learn besides all that thou hast come to know by thy nice observation.

3. Thou hast an understanding clear as the mirror by its own nature (reflecting every image within itself); and yet thy queries about the same, serve as the cleansing of the reflector (in order to refract its light to others).

4. Thou hast a mind like that of Suka—the son of the great Vyása, who knowing the knowable by intuition, was yet in need of some precepts for confirmation of his belief.

5. Ráma said: How was it sir, that Suka—the son of the great Vyása—who did not rest assured at first of his knowledge of the 196346 knowable, came to be settled in his belief afterwards.

196347
196348 6. Viswámitra answered: "Hear me relate to thee Ráma, the narrative 196349 of Sukadeva, whose case was exactly like thine, and the narration of 196350 which is a preventive of future births (in this world)."

196351
196352 7. There is the great Vyása sitting on his seat of gold by thy father's 196353 side, swarthy in his complexion like a coal-black hill, but blazing as 196354 the burning sun (by his brilliancy).

196355
196356 8. His son was named Suka, a boy of great learning and wisdom, of a 196357 moon-like countenance, and a stature sedate as the sacrificial altar.

196358
196359 9. He reflected in his mind the vanity of worldly affairs like thyself, 196360 and became equally indifferent to all its concerns.

196361
196362 10. It was then that this great minded youth was led by his own
196363 discriminative understanding to a long inquiry after what was true, 196364 which he found out at last by his own investigation.

196365
196366 11. Having obtained the highest truth, he was still unsettled in 196367 his mind, and could not come to the belief of the certainty of his 196368 knowledge.

196369
196370 12. His mind grew indifferent to its perceptions of the transitory 196371 enjoyments of the world, and like the _Chátaka_ thirsted only after the 196372 dew drops of heavenly bliss.

196374 13. Once upon a time the clear sighted Suka finding his father the sage 196375 Krishna-Dwaipáyana-Vyása, sitting quietly alone by himself, he asked 196376 him with reverence; saying:-

196377
196378 14. Tell me, O sage! whence this commotion of the world had its rise, 196379 and how it may subside. What is its cause, how far is it to extend, and 196380 where is it to end?

196381
196382 15. The sage Vyása who knew the nature of the soul, being thus asked 196383 by his son, explained to him clearly all that was to be said (on the 196384 subject).

196386 16. Suka thought that he already knew all this by his good 196387 understanding, and did not therefore think much of his father's 196388 instructions.

196390 17. Vyása understanding the thoughts of his son, replied to him saying 196391 that, he knew no better the true nature of these things.

196392
196393 18. But that there was a prince named Janaka in this land, who well
196394 knew the knowledge of the knowable, and from whom Suka could learn 196395 every thing.

196396
196397 19. Suka being thus directed by his father, repaired to the city of 196398 Videha at the foot of mount Sumeru, which was under the rule of Janaka.

196399
196400 20. The club-bearer (door keeper) informed the high minded Janaka of 196401 his coming, telling him that Suka the son of Vyása was waiting at the 196402 gate.

196403
196404 21. Janaka who understood that Suka had come to learn from him, gave no
196405 heed to the informant, but held his silence for seven days afterwards.

196406
196407 22. The prince then ordered him to be brought in the outer compound, 196408 where he had to remain in the vexation of his spirit for seven days
196409 more as before.

196410
196411 23. Suka was then commanded to enter the inner apartment, where he 196412 continued a week more without seeing the prince.

196413
196414 24. Here Janaka entertained the moon-faced Suka with abundance of 196415 eatables, perfumeries and lusty damsels.

196416
196417 25. But neither those vexations nor these entertainments could affect 196418 the tenor of Suka's mind, which remained firm as a rock at the blasts 196419 of wind.

196420
196421 26. He remained there as the full moon (without any wane or increase), 196422 tranquil in his desires, silent and contented in his mind.

196423
196424 27. The prince Janaka having thus known the (unalterable) disposition 196425 of Suka's mind, had him introduced to his presence, where seeing the 196426 complacency of his soul, he rose up and bowed down to him.

196427
196428 28. Janaka said: "You have accomplished to the full all your duties 196429 in this world, and obtained the object of your heart's desire to its 196430 utmost extent; what is it that you now desire for which you are welcome 196431 at mine".

196433 29. Suka said: "Tell me my guide whence sprang all this bustle 196434 (of worldly life); and tell me also how it may soon come to its 196435 subsidence."

196436
196437 30. Viswámitra said: Being thus asked by Suka, Janaka spoke to him the 196438 same things which he had learned from his great souled father.

196440 31. Suka then said: "All this I have come to know long before by my own 196441 intuition, and then from the speech of my father in answer to my query.

196442
196443 32. "You sir, who are the most eloquent of all, have spoken to the same 196444 purport, and the same is found to be the true sense of the Sástras.

196446 33. "That the world is a creation of volition, and loses itself
196447 with the absence of our desires; and that it is an accursed and 196448 unsubstantial world after all, is the conclusion arrived at by all 196449 sages.

196451 34. "Now tell me truly you long armed prince, what you think this world
196452 to be (whether a reality or unreality); that my mind may be set at rest 196453 by you from its wandering all about the world (in search of truth)."

196454
196455 35. Janaka replied: "There is nothing more certain, O sage! than what 196456 you have known by yourself and heard from your father.

196457
196458 36. "There is but one undivided intelligent spirit known as the 196459 universal soul and nothing besides; it becomes confined by its desires, 196460 and freed by its want of them.

196461
196462 37. "You have truly come to the knowledge of the knowable, whereby your 196463 great soul has desisted from its attachment to objects of enjoyment and 196464 vision.

196466 38. "You must be a hero to have overcome your desire in the lengthening
196467 chain of attractive enjoyments from your early youth. What more do you 196468 want to hear?

196470 39. "Even your father, with all his learning in every science, and 196471 devotedness to austerities, has not arrived to the state of perfection 196472 like you.

196474 40. "I am a pupil of Vyása, and you are his son; but you are greater 196475 than both of us, by your abandonment of the taste for the enjoyments of 196476 life.

196478 41. "You have obtained whatever is obtainable by the comprehensiveness
196479 of your mind; and as you take no interest in the outer and visible 196480 world, you are liberated from it, and have nothing to doubt of."

196481
196482 42. Being thus advised by the magnanimous Janaka, Suka remained silent 196483 with his mind fixed in the purely supreme object.

196484
196485 43. Then being devoid of sorrow and fear, and released from all 196486 efforts, exertions and doubts, he repaired to a peaceful summit of the 196487 mount Meru to obtain his final absorption.
196488

196489 44. There he passed ten thousands of rains in a state of unalterable
196490 meditation, till at last he broke his mortal coil, and was extinguished
196491 in the supreme soul like a lamp without oil.
196492

196493 45. Thus purified from the stain of transmigration by abstaining from 196494 earthly desires, the great souled Suka sank into the holy state of the 196495 Supreme Spirit, as a drop of water mixes with the waters or merges into 196496 the depth of the ocean.
196497
196498
196499
196500

196501 CHAPTER II.

196502 SPEECH OF VISWÁMITRA.

196503
196504
196505
196506 Viswámitra said:—
196507

196508 Ráma! it now becomes you to have your mind properly purified from its 196509 doubts, as it was done in the case of the son of Vyása.
196510

196511 2. You see, O great sages! how perfectly the knowable is known to Ráma, 196512 whose good understanding has learnt to feel a distaste for worldly 196513 enjoyments, as if they were diseases unto him.
196514

196515 3. You well know that the fixed principle in the mind of one knowing 196516 the knowable, is to have an aversion to all the enjoyments of life.
196517

196518 4. It is the desire of fruition that chains down a man fastly to the 196519 earth; but the knowledge of the frailties here serves to dispel his 196520 darkness.
196521

196522 5. Know Ráma that it is the curtailing of desires which the wise call 196523 liberty, and the fastening of our desires to earthly objects, is what 196524 is termed our confinement here.
196525

196526 6. Spiritual knowledge is easily obtainable by most men here, but a 196527 distaste to (pleasurable) objects is hard to be had (however painful it 196528 is to procure them).
196529

196530 7. He who fully comprehends a thing, is said to know it, and who so 196531 knows what is knowable, is called a learned man; no earthly enjoyments
196532 can be delectable to such high minded men.
196533

196534 8. The mind that has no zest for earthly pleasures, except the glory of 196535 disinterested deeds, is said to be liberated even in the present life.
196536

196537 9. As there grows no vegetable in a sterile soil, so there grows no
196538 disinclination to worldliness, until one comes to know the knowable 196539 reality (_i.e._ to say: neither the godly can be worldly, nor the 196540 worldly be godly).
196541

196542 10. Hence know this supporter of Raghu's race to have verily known the 196543 knowable, which has made him disgusted with his princely enjoyments.
196544

196545 11. I tell you great sages that, whatever Ráma has come to know by his 196546 intuition, requires to be confirmed by Vasishtha for the tranquility of 196547 his mind.
196548

196549 12. It is only a reliance in the Unity, that Ráma now requires for his 196550 repose, just as the beauty of autumn depends on the clearness of the 196551 firmament.
196552

13. Let the venerable Vasishtha then reason with the high minded Ráma, and restore the peace of his mind.
14. For he is the master and family preceptor of the whole race of the Raghus; besides he is all knowing and all seeing; and has a clear insight (into all things) of the three times (present, past and future).
15. Then addressing himself to Vasishtha he said:—you _well remember sir_, the instruction given us of old, for pacifying our mutual enmity, and promoting the welfare of the high minded sages.
16. When our lord the lotus-born Brahmá, seated on the table land of Nishadha mountain, and shaded by the Sarala trees, delivered his wise lectures to us and the sages.
17. It is by means of that knowledge of liberation that our worldly desires are dispelled like the darkness of night by sun-beams.
18. Please now, O Bráhman, to communicate that rational knowledge of the knowable to your pupil Ráma, whereby he may gain the peace of his mind.
19. It will be no difficult task for you to teach the spotless Ráma, whose mirror-like mind is quite clear to take the reflection.
20. The wisdom of the holy, their learning of the Sástras, and the scholarship of the learned, are then only praiseworthy, when they are communicated to a good student, and those who are disgusted with the world.
21. But instruction given to one who is no student nor disgusted with the world, becomes as polluted as milk put in a hide vessel.
22. Again the instruction imparted by one devoid of passions and affections, fear and anger, pride and sin, serves to infuse tranquility into the mind.
23. At these words of Viswámitra the son of Gadhi, the assembled sages Vyása, Nárada and others, honoured his saying with the exclamation "bravo", "well said" &c.
24. Then the venerable Vasishtha brilliant as Brahmá his father, and seated by the side of the king, spoke in reply:
25. O sage, I will perform without fail, what you have commanded me to do, for who, though mighty, can refuse to perform the behests of the good and wise?
26. I will destroy the mental darkness of the princes Ráma and others by the light of knowledge, as we dispel the gloom of night by the light of a lamp.
27. I well remember the instructions which were given of yore by the lotus-born Brahmá on the Nishadha mountain, for dispelling the errors of the world.
28. Having said so, the high-minded Vasishtha made up his mind as one girds up his loins, to deliver his lecture to Ráma for dispelling his ignorance, and showing him the state of supreme felicity.

CHAPTER III.

ON THE REPEATED CREATIONS OF THE WORLD.

Vasishtha said:—

196622
196623 "I will now expound to you Ráma! the knowledge that was imparted of old 196624 by our lord the lotus-born (Brahmá), after creation of the world, for 196625 the peace of mankind."

196626
196627 2. Ráma said:—I know sir, you will expound to me the subject of 196628 liberation in full length; but remove first my fallacy about the 196629 frailty of this world.

196630
196631 3. And how it was that, the great sage Vyása—the father and guide of 196632 Suka, did not attain to disembodied emancipation (after his death) with 196633 all his omniscience, while his son did so.

196634
196635 4. Vasishtha said:—(Hear me Ráma), there is no counting of the atoms 196636 proceeding from the spirit and forming the three worlds both before and 196637 after the birth of the glorious sun.

196638
196639 5. There is no body even who can count the millions of orbs which at 196640 present form the three worlds.

196641
196642 6. Nor can any one say by calculation, what numbers of creation 196643 will rise from the (unlimited) ocean of divine existence, like its 196644 interminable waves (for ever).

196646 7. Ráma said:—It is needless to talk of worlds gone by or yet to come;
196647 say what you will of the present (state of existence).

196648
196649 8. Vasishtha said:—This world consists of brute, human and heavenly 196650 beings, whose lives when they are said to perish in any part of it are 196651 really existent in the same part.

196653 9. The mind is called to be ever-fluctuating, and gives rise to (all 196654 things in) the three worlds in itself. It resides in vacuity in the 196655 form of the heart, and the increate (God) also residing in the vacuous 196656 soul (gives the mind the power to realize the latent ideas of the soul).

196657
196658 10. The millions of beings that are dead, those that are dying 196659 and will die hereafter, are all to be reborn here according to the 196660 different desires in their minds.

196661
196662 11. The external world appearing as a reality, is in truth but a 196663 creation of our desires; it is an ideal castle in the air, and a magic 196664 view spread before us.

196665
196666 12. It is as false as an earthquake in a fit of delirium, as a 196667 hobgoblin that is shown to terrify children, as a string of pearls in 196668 the clear firmament, and as the moving trees on the bank to a passenger 196669 in the boat.

196670
196671 13. It is an illusion as the phantom of a city in a dream, and as 196672 untrue as the imagination of a flower growing in the air. The unreality 196673 of the world best appears to one at the point of and after his death.

196674
196675 14. But this knowledge of (the unreality of the world) becomes darkened
196676 upon one's being reborn on earth, when the shadow of this world falls
196677 again on the mirror of his sentient soul.

196678
196679 15. Thus there is a struggle for repeated births and deaths here, and a 196680 fancy for the next world after one's death.

196681
196682 16. After one's shuffling off his body, he assumes another and then 196683 another form, and thus the world is as unstable as a stool made of 196684 plantain leaves and its coatings.

196685
196686 17. The dead have no sensation of the earth and other elementary 196687 bodies, nor of the course of the world; but they fall again to these 196688 errors upon their being reborn here.

196689
196690 18. There is an interminable ignorance resembling an immense river

196691 enveloping the face of creation, and breaking into streamlets of 196692 unfordable ignorance.

196693
196694 19. The Divinity like a sea shoots forth in the various waves of 196695 creation, which rise incessantly and plentifully one after the other.

196696
196697 20. All beings here are but the waves of this sea, of which some are 196698 alike to one another in their minds and natures, while others are half 196699 alike, and some quite different from the rest.

196700
196701 <21.> I reckon yonder sagely Vyása as one of the thirty two of these 196702 waves, on account of his vast knowledge, and good looking appearance.

196703
196704 22. There were twelve of them possessed of a lesser understanding, they 196705 were the patriarchs of men, and endued with equal energy. Ten of them
196706 were men of subdued spirits, and the rest were adepts in their family 196707 duties.

196709 23. There will be born again other Vyásas and Válmíkis, and likewise
196710 some other Bhrigus and Angirás, as well as other Pulastyas and others
196711 in different forms.

196712
196713 24. All other men, Asuras and gods with all their hosts are repeatedly 196714 born and destroyed either in their former or different shapes.

196715
196716 25. Like this there are seventy two Tretá cycles in a Kalpa age of 196717 Brahmá, some of which have passed by and others to follow. Thus 196718 will there be other people like those that have gone by, and as I 196719 understand, another Ráma and Vasishtha like ourselves (by the eternal 196720 rotation of ideas in the Divine mind).

196721
196722 26. There have been ten successive incarnations of this Vyása, who has 196723 done such wondrous acts, and is famed for his vast knowledge.

196725 27. Myself and Válmíki have been contemporaries many a time, as also 196726 born in different ages and very many times.

196727
196728 28. We have been many times, and there were others also like myself, 196729 and so was I born also in many forms (in many ages).

196730
196731 29. This Vyása will again be born eight times hereafter, and again will 196732 he write his Mahábhárata and the Purána histories.

196733
196734 30. He having divided the Vedas and described the acts of Bhárata's 196735 race (in the Mahábhárata), and established the knowledge of Brahm (in 196736 the Vedánta), is to attain to his disembodied liberation (after his 196737 final termination).

196738
196739 31. This Vyása who is devoid of fear and sorrow, and has become 196740 tranquil and emancipate in himself after subduing his mind and 196741 discarding the worldly desires is said to be liberated even in his 196742 present life time.

196743
196744 32. The living emancipate may sometimes be associated by his relatives 196745 and estates, his acts and duties, his knowledge and wisdom, and all his 196746 exertions like other men's, or he may forsake them all at once.

196747
196748 33. These beings are either reborn a hundred times in some age or never 196749 at all (as in the case of divine incarnations), and depending on the 196750 inscrutable will (Máyá) of God.

196751
196752 34. There souls undergo the like changes by repetition, as a bushel of 196753 grain, which is collected to be sown repeatedly, and to be reaped again
196754 and again (in the same or some other field).

196755
196756 35. As the sea heaves its incessant surges of different shapes, so are 196757 all beings born incessantly in various forms in the vast ocean of time.

196758
196759 36. The wise man who is liberated in his life time, lives with his

196760 internal belief (of God) in a state of tranquility, without any doubt 196761 in his mind, and quite content with the ambrosia of equanimity.

196766 CHAPTER IV.

196767 PRAISE OF ACTS AND EXERTIONS.

196768
196769
196770
196771 Vasishtha said:—
196772

196773 I know gentle Ráma that, liberation of the soul, whether in its 196774 embodied or disembodied state is both alike, as the sea-water and its 196775 waves are the same liquid substance.
196776

196777 2. The liberation whether of embodied or disembodied spirits, consists 196778 in their detachment from the objects of sense: hence the soul
196779 unattached to sensual gratification, is (said to be) liberated, having 196780 no idea of sensible objects.
196781

196782 3. And though we see before us the living liberated sage (Vyása) as an 196783 embodied person, yet we have no doubt of the detachment of his inward 196784 soul from the (mortal coil of his) body.
196785

196786 4. The difference between the embodied and disembodied souls, when they 196787 are equally enlightened and liberated, is like that of the sea-water in 196788 its calm and billowy states.
196789

196790 5. There is no more difference between bodily and unembodied liberation 196791 than there is betwixt the air in motion and at rest.
196792

196793 6. Liberation whether with or without the body, is productive of 196794 unselfishness; we have lost our selfishness ever since we have come to 196795 the knowledge of an undivided unity (of the soul).
196796

196797 7. Now therefore attend to the true doctrine that I am going to deliver 196798 to you, which will be a jewel to your ears as it will dispel the 196799 darkness of ignorance (from your mind).
196800

196801 8. Know, O son of Raghu, that every thing in this world is obtainable 196802 by our efforts being properly employed (to our purposes).
196803

196804 9. This (knowledge of truth) rises as the moon (in the human mind), and 196805 sheds its cooling and delightful influence to the heart, that there is 196806 no other way to gain the fruits of our exertions but by our efforts.
196807

196808 10. We evidently see the results of the exercise of our efforts, and 196809 nothing coming out from what the dull and mistaken call as chance or 196810 fate.
196811

196812 11. An effort when directed according to the counsel and conduct of the 196813 good in the exercise of the action of the body and mind, it is attended 196814 with success, otherwise it is as vain as the freak of a madman.
196815

196816 12. Thus he who wishes to acquire riches, and perseveres in its 196817 acquisition, surely succeeds in gaining them; or else he stops short in 196818 the midway.
196819

196820 13. It was by means of the exertion of their efforts that some 196821 particular persons have obtained the paramount dominion of Indra over 196822 the three worlds.
196823

196824 14. It is by the exertion of one's efforts that he attains to the rank 196825 of the lotus-born (Brahmá); and some even gain the inward joy of the 196826 state of Brahm by it.
196827

196828 15. It was by virtue of his self-exertion that some body has become the best among men, even as he who bears the ensign of the eagle (Vishnu among the gods).

16. It was by the exertion of one's efforts that some persons succeeded to obtain the form of Siva accompanied by his female power, and adorned by the semi-circle of the moon in his crest.

17. Know our actions to be of two kinds namely, those of former and present lives: and that acts of the <present> life generally supersede those of the past.

18. Know also that energy joined with constant practice, and supported by wisdom and some stimulating force, is able to break down the mount of Meru, and the demerits of acts in the former lives of men.

19. The exertions of a man proceeding from his good efforts and countenanced by the law, lead to his success, or else they either go for nothing or turn to his disadvantage.

20. So a man laid up in a state of disability, is unable to twist his fingers in order to hold a little water in the hollow of his palm for drink: while there is another who (by his well directed efforts) gets the possession of seas and islands, mountains and cities for himself, supports all his dependents and relations, and does not think this earth too great for him.

CHAPTER V.

NECESSITY OF ACTIVITY.

Vasishtha said:—

It is the will or inclination that is the prime instrument of all actions done even according to the rules of law and śāstras, as it is the reflection of light that gives various hues to things.

2. Whoever wishes to do anything desirable to him by unlawful acts, it becomes as fruitless as the endeavours of a madman.

3. As you try so you get both of good and evil: and fortune and exertion are the joint causes of acts according to fatalists.

4. Human exertions are either lawful or unlawful; the former leading to success, and the latter to dangerous consequences.

5. Fortune and exertions contend with each other like two rams of unequal strength, wherein the mightier overcomes the other.

6. Therefore should man apply himself diligently (to his duties), and employ his skill and promptness after them in such a way, as his to-day may overcome the morrow (_i.e._, do the works of to-morrow to-day).

7. When two unequal forces (of two persons) contend with one another like two rams, the stronger force whether of this or that man, overcomes the other.

8. When one incurs a failure or danger even by his lawful exertions, he should know it to be the result of his misapplied exertions.

9. One by his utmost exertion in the right way, as by the gnashing of his teeth (and the like), can overcome his misfortune and so does his bad luck sometimes baffle his exertions.

10. When one finds himself to be led astray by the demerit of his acts of a former state of existence, he must attempt to subdue the same by greater energy of his present state.

11. So far should one diligently endeavour to exercise his exertions, as he may be able to beat down the evils resulting from his bad fortune (or predestination).

12. The evils of bad fortune are undoubtedly removed by the meritorious acts of the present life, as the bad consequence of an act of yesterday is averted by its remedy of today.

13. Having trampled over an unfavorable fortune by one's reliance on his continuous energy, he must attempt to secure to himself every good for his well-being in his present life.

14. Know that tranquility is not to be found by the effortlessness of dull ass-like men; it is the lawful energy of men which is said to secure his welfare in both worlds.

15. And that one should make his way out of the pit of this world by force of his energy and diligence, just as the lion breaks out from his cage.

16. One must ponder in himself every day that his body is subject to corruption, his beastly acts must be kept backward and man like acts put forward.

17. It is our good exertions that are attended by good results as the bad ones are followed by bad consequences. Chance is a mere meaningless word.

18. Do not make your bloom of youth useless as ashes by sitting idly at home and enjoying the bliss of the harem like a worm in the sore.

19. He who has no reliance on present objects, but depends upon suppositions of the past, is as a man flying for fear of his own hands supposing them as snakes.

20. It is a pleasure to men of perverted understandings to think themselves guided by their fortunes, prosperity flies away far off from such men who depend on their fortunes.

21. Therefore let a man diligently apply himself first to (the cultivation of) his reason, and then investigate into the works of abstruse spiritual knowledge.

22. Those who do not set their hearts to acts according to the dictates of the sástras, but exert themselves otherwise to gain (their ends), are accursed as mad men for their vain attempts.

23. Thinking there is no end of exertions one declines to take the pains (after anything), and says that, no pains can bring out a gem from a stone (or oil from water).

24. Know that there is a limitation both of human lot and exertion, as of all other things as a pot or picture having a (limited capacity and length).

25. And that it is by means of good conduct derived from best precepts and the company of the good, that one succeeds to his object, and a disposition that breaks loose of these (bounds), is sure to fall to the contrary (extreme of) ruin.

26. Again any man who conducts himself in the right course of action, never fails in his attempts at any time.

27. Some among the best of men, who had been reduced to misery by their poverty and helplessness, have again risen to the eminence of Indra by exertion of their manhood.

196967 28. By learning the Sástras well from boyhood, by keeping company with 196968 the good, and by possession of good qualities, as also by diligent 196969 application, a man is sure to gain his object.

196970
196971 29. It has been seen, known, heard, and experienced (by us) that acts 196972 are rewarded with success; and they are dull-headed who think of 196973 obtaining it from fortune or by chance.

196974
196975 30. Had there not been the folly of idleness in this world, what man
196976 would fail either to be rich or learned? It is by reason of idleness
196977 that this earth is filled to its utmost limit of the sea with indigent
196978 and beastly men.

196980 31. Let a man after passing his childhood, and getting rid of its false 196981 and idle playfulness and when he has attained the age of youthful 196982 vigour, apply himself diligently to the company of wise men, and to 196983 the cultivation of his understanding by a knowledge of the Sástras and 196984 their meanings, and by scanning well his own faults and qualities.

196985
196986 32. Válmiki said:—After the sage had said these sayings, the day 196987 passed away, and the sages went to bathe after taking leave of the 196988 assembly, where they joined again with the rising beams of the sun
196989 dispelling the gloom of night.

196990 196991 196992 196993 196994 CHAPTER VI.

196995 196996 REFUTATION OF FATALISM.

196997
196998
196999 Vasishtha resumed saying:—

197000
197001 Now fate being no other than the result of our actions of the former 197002 state of our existence, it is possible to leave it at a distance, and 197003 to extricate one's self (from its fetters) by betaking himself to good 197004 company and study of moral Sástras.

197005
197006 2. Whatever one attempts to do, he readily meets with its reward: this 197007 being the effect of exertion. Fate is no other but the same thing.

197008
197009 3. Men laboring hard, are heard to exclaim "O how painful it is": so 197010 men suffering under fate cry out "O hard is fate!" (so the one is as 197011 bad as the other).

197012
197013 4. Thus then fate being no other than a name for our past actions, it 197014 is as easily overcome (by present acts) as a boy (is subdued) by an 197015 adult youth.

197016
197017 5. As some bad conduct of yesterday is corrected by proper behaviour of 197018 the present day, so the anterior fate is removed by (posterior) acts.

197019
197020 6. Those carnal minded libertines who do not try the means (of 197021 reforming their fate), but depend upon the favor of fortune, are 197022 perverted in their nature and marked for misery.

197023
197024 7. Thus if the acts of manliness are capable of forefending one's 197025 misfortunes, it must be acknowledged that manliness which destroys the 197026 other, is the mightier of the two.

197027
197028 8. As of two fruits growing on the same fore-stalk, the one is found to 197029 be empty within and the other full of juice, so the fruit of fate is 197030 rendered abortive by that of manliness.

197032 9. Seeing the decay of the best things in the world, we must own the 197033 predominant power of the cause of this decay.

197034
197035 10. Like two rams our fate and exertions are fighting with one another, wherein the victory is always on the side of the stronger.

11. In the case of the royal elephant's taking up a beggar boy for being made the ruler (of a country), its cause is to be attributed more to the vote of the country-men and citizens (than to chance or fortune).

12. As a man takes his food and grinds it under his teeth, so is one (depending on fate) crushed by the stronger party relying on his exertions.

13. Inferior servants are thus employed like clods of earth by their more active masters in any work they like.

14. Silly and impotent men seeing the strong thriving by their exertions whether apparent or unseen, are apt to attribute it to their good fortune (instead of their diligence).

15. The strong efforts of men truly constitute their presiding fortune, and these two are viewed alike by the wise.

16. In the case of the (aforesaid) beggar boy's installation to the ruling and protection of the people of a realm, the unanimous concurrence of the law and ministers, of the elephant and citizens (is to be taken as the chief cause).

17. Should the beggar boy be ever elected for a ruler by the royal elephant itself (without the assent of men), in that case it is to be attributed to the boy's good fortune only (because there was no sensible exertion on his side).

18. Present acts destroy those of the past life and so also the vice-versa comes to pass; but the exertions of a man are undoubtedly successful (at all times).

19. Of these two powers that of the present state is manifestly superior to the other; hence it is as possible to overcome the past by the present, as to lick a boy by an adult.

20. As a hail shower lays waste the cultivation of a whole year, so also doth the predominant fate sometimes overpower the attempts of this life.

21. However it does not behooove us to be sorry at the loss of our long earned treasure (as of the harvest), for what avails our sorrow at what is beyond our control.

22. If I should sorrow for what I have not the power to prevent, I must then weep all the days of my life because I am not to be spared by death.

23. All our acts are subject to their proper time and place, and to the modes of their operation and combination according to the course of nature; hence it is that the more diligent are the most successful (everywhere).

24. We ought therefore to rely in our exertions and clearness of understanding by the help of Sástras and association with the wise, for fording over the ocean of this world.

25. Actions of the past and present lives are the two fruit trees growing in the garden of humanity; of which the one that is cultivated best, thrives and fructifies the most.

26. He who is unable to overcome his false fate by his best exertions (in this life), is no better than an ignorant beast that has no power over its pain or pleasure.

27. He who thinks of going to heaven or hell by the will of the Maker, is also a slave to destiny and no better than a beast.

- 197105
197106 28. The man of a noble mind and one employed in acts of goodness, 197107 breaks off from the errors of the world as a lion from its cage.
197108
197109 29. Those who vainly imagine themselves to be led about by some 197110 (supernatural power), and so slight their necessary duties, are to be 197111 shunned at a distance as the mean and base.
197112
197113 30. There are thousands of acts that are attended with gain or loss to 197114 their doers; but it is the duty of man to do what is right whether they 197115 are pleasant or painful.
197116
197117 31. He who does not transgress the bounds of law, nor forsake the 197118 duties (of his race), is attended by every blessing abundant as the 197119 pearls in the sea.
197120
197121 32. Devoted diligence in acts leading to one's object, is termed to be 197122 his manliness by the wise; and that being guided by the Sástra leads to 197123 his success.
197124
197125 33. An act accompanied by exertion, is of itself the accomplisher of 197126 one's object, and the company of the wise and study of good books
197127 serve to raise a man by brightening his understanding.
197128
197129 34. The infinite happiness or a tranquil spirit is known as the Summum
197130 bonum by the wise; and those good works are fit for study which lead 197131 to that state.
197132
197133 35. The acts of our former lives constitute what we call our destiny, 197134 and they return to us from the region of the gods, for our good in both 197135 worlds.
197136
197137 36. We blame the fate which is a creation of the fancy of the ignorant, 197138 who by their adoration of the same come to meet their destruction.
197139
197140 37. One benefits himself always by his activity in both worlds, as his 197141 good acts of to-day gives a grace to those of yesterday.
197142
197143 38. Whoso therefore applies himself with diligence to his acts, reaps 197144 their fruits like that of an Amalaki in his palm, which though it is 197145 within his grasp, yet it could not be obtained without the cost of some 197146 labour:
197147
197148 39. It is the ignorant only that depart from the beaten path, and fall 197149 into the error of fatalism. Therefore give up that false faith in an 197150 unreal fate, which is a mere creation of the imagination and devoid of 197151 any cause or effect; and apply to your manly exertions.
197152
197153 40. The fruit of following the Sástras and observing the good customs 197154 and local usages, is long known (to be wholesome), as exciting the 197155 heart and the exertion of the limbs to action. This it is what they 197156 called "manly activity."
197157
197158 41. All wise men after discussion of the subject of fate and acts, have 197159 applied themselves to activity by utter rejection of fatality, and 197160 accomplished their ends by attendance on the good and wise.
197161
197162 42. Knowing the efficacy of activity, every one should betake himself 197163 to his personal exertions, and attain to his highest perfection by 197164 attending to good Sástras and the wise counsels of learned men.
197165
197166 43. And knowing the bondage of our births to be full of pain, let 197167 people strive for the exercise of their activities, and obtain the true 197168 and sweet blessing of tranquility by their attendance on the wise.
197169
197170
197171
197172
197173

ON THE NECESSITY OF ACTIVITY.

- Having obtained a body free from disease and a mind free from trouble, one should try to know the knowable to prevent his further birth (in this world).
2. Whoso wishes to avert his destiny by means of his activity, obtains the acme of his wishes both in this world as well as in the next.
3. But whoever is averse to assiduity and relies in his luck, he is an enemy to his own soul, and sacrifices all his virtues, riches and hopes (to his idleness).
4. It is the exercise of our sensuous and mental faculties as also of the members of the body, which are the different modes of our exertions, that leads us to success.
5. Our perceptions are the cause of our mental activity, and this actuates the body to action, whereby we obtain the fruits of our desire.
6. In whatever case there is some act (enjoined in the Sástra), it points us to our exertions and never to destiny. Even children are well aware of this.
7. It was by the exercise of their exertions that Divaspati (Jupiter) became the lord of gods, and Sukra obtained the preceptorship of demons.
8. There have been many weak, poor and miserable men, who have by means of their manly exertions become equal to Indra himself.
9. So also there have been many great men on earth, who after enjoyment of a great many extraordinary things and luxuries here, have become guests in hell for want of the exercise of their manly virtues.
10. In this manner have all beings evaded the effects of their various states of want and opulence by means of their own exertions (in the right way).
11. There are three fold benefits derived from the study of books, from lectures of a preceptor, and from one's own industry, all of which are attendant on our exertions and not destiny.
12. This is the long and short of all the Sástras, that diligence preserves our minds from all evils, by employing them to whatever is good and right.
13. To apply with diligence to whatever is excellent, not low or mean and not liable to loss or decay, is the precept of parents and preceptors to their sons and pupils.
14. I get the immediate fruit of my labour in proportion to my exertion: hence I say, I enjoy the fruit of my labour and not of fortune.
15. Activity gives us success and it is this that elevates the intelligent. But men of little understandings rely only in fortune in their miserable state.
16. We have ocular evidence (of the efficacy) of activity every day, in the instances of men travelling in distant countries (for the sake of gain).
17. He that eats becomes satiate and not who starves: so he who walks is said to proceed and not one who rests: and in like manner whoso speaks is called a speaker and not the silent man: thus action makes the man.

18. Wise men escape from great difficulties by means of their exertions; but not so the mistaken fatalist by his fruitless inertness.
19. Whoso acts in any manner, gets his reward accordingly; but the restive man has nothing to expect anywhere.
20. By well directed industry a man reaps the best reward, as he meets with its reverse by his misapplied labour: think upon this O Rāma! and do as you like.
21. The reward of industry which a man meets with sooner or later at any time or place, the same is said by the wise to be his fortune.
22. No one can see his fortune, nor has any body ever seen the same, nor is there such a thing to be found in any world: it is but the merit of our acts here which they place in the other world.
23. A man is born on earth to grow up and decay in his time, and no destiny is seen therein in the same way as his childhood, youth and old age.
24. One's application to diligence and action for the attainment of an object, is known by the term exertion by the wise, whereby all things are accomplished (and which is no destiny).
25. One's going from one place to another, his holding a thing in the hand, and the movement of his limbs, are all the acts of his exertion and not his destiny.
26. There is another kind of propensity to acts productive of evil; this sort of action is likened to the attempt of a mad man which yields no good.
27. Men of acute understandings raise themselves to elevation, by their association with the virtuous, study of good works and active employment to duties tending to their own good.
28. The boundless joy arising from equanimity, is said to constitute one's Summum bonum (upon earth). This blessing also results from a man's diligent application to the Śāstras (and not from his destiny).
29. It is the understanding that leads to the knowledge of the Śāstras, as it is the other that tends to our right understanding of things. Just so does the lotus serve to beautify a lake, as it is the lake which lends its grace to the lotus. (_i.e._ They serve mutually to assist each other).
30. It is also by virtue of one's deep study and good company in youth, that a man attains his desirable objects afterwards (which are the results of his exertions).
31. It was by means of his activity that Vishnu had conquered the demons, and established the order of the world. It was by this that he created the worlds none of which could be the work of fate.
32. Now, O lord of Raghu's race! employ your efforts to the exertion of your manly activities in such a way in this earth, that you may live free from fear of being bitten by the serpentine people in this arbor of the world (_i.e._ crush the malice of your enemies).

CHAPTER VIII.

INVALIDATION OF DESTINY.

Vasishtha continued saying that:—

What does destiny mean, which has no form, nor act, no motion nor might, but is a false notion rooted in the (minds) of the ignorant.

2. It is a word that has come into vogue from the idea of the future retribution of one's past actions (or retributive justice) and the like, which is designated "destiny".

3. From this the ignorant are led to believe that there is a thing as destiny: the inscrutability of which has led them to the fallacy as that of the supposition of a snake in a rope.

4. As a past misdeed of yesterday is rectified by a good action of the following day, let this day therefore supercede the past, and employ yourself to-day to action.

5. The perverted understanding that believes in a destiny grounded on its erroneous conception, may well enter into the fire from his conviction that it will not burn him unless it is so destined.

6. If destiny is the sole cause of every thing, why then should a man betake himself to his actions of bathing and making his offerings, sitting and walking, all of which may be done by his destiny.

7. What then is the necessity of one's advising another to do a thing when destiny is the director of all? Let then all be silent and say nothing to nobody.

8. There is no one to be seen on earth that is motionless except the bodies of the dead; and if it is action that produces anything, it is useless to believe in destiny.

9. Nor is there any co-operative power of the invisible destiny perceptible in the actions of men, whence it is but a meaningless word.

10. Two things as the implements and members of the body being joined together, have each their several action (as that of the pen and razor and the hand in writing and shaving); but the hand being wanted, nothing can be done by destiny (with its having those tools).

11. There is no such clear idea of a destiny like those of the mind and intellect, even in the (illiterate) cow-herd or in the (learned) pandit. Hence it is a mere non-entity.

12. If the concept of destiny be other (than that of an agent), it must mean something else; or if it be the same thing (with the agent) why then give it a different name (as destiny)? If it be proved to be an imaginary term, then why not imagine your exertion to be agent (of your action)?

13. The immaterial destiny like vacuity has no connection with the material body. If it had a form or figure it would be visible (to some one or other); hence destiny is a nullity.

14. If destiny is the main spring of the movements of all beings in the three worlds, then let all creatures rest at ease (with the assurance) that destiny will perform their parts.

15. The belief that we are guided by destiny and do as we are led to do, is a deception and an allegation (of self excuse); in fact there is no such thing as destiny.

16. It is the fool that fancies to himself a destiny and relies on it to his own disadvantage; while the intelligent raise themselves to better states by means of their exertion.

17. Say who is there among the mighty and brave, the intelligent and learned, that looks or waits upon destiny in this world?

18. Destiny may be said good, if it can have the power of saving a man from being beheaded, whom fortune-tellers had pronounced by their calculation to be long lived.
19. Again, O Rághava, should one who is foretold by his fortune-teller to become a learned man, attain his learning without being taught in it, then may we believe fortune to be true.
20. Mark, O Ráma! how the sage Viswámित्रa has cast away his destiny at a distance; and attained to Brahmahood by his own exertions.
21. Look at us and others who have become sages, that it was by our industry we became aeronauts or wanderers in the etherial regions.
22. Remember, O Ráma, how the chiefs of the Dánava race, have established their empires on earth by their prowess, and by discarding their destinies altogether.
23. Look again how the chiefs of gods have wrested the extensive earth from those demons by their valourous deeds of slaying and harassing them (in battle).
24. See Ráma! how they make handsome wicker vessels (of bamboo work) for the holding of water by their own industry, and without the aid of any destiny to the completion of the same.
25. In all our works of giving and receiving, walking, resting and the like, we see no causality of destiny in their completion, as we see of medicines (in healing diseases).
26. Therefore O Ráma, give up this destiny of your mistaken fancy; which is in reality devoid of its cause or effect, and is a false and ideal nullity; and betake yourself to your best exertions.

CHAPTER IX.

INVESTIGATION OF ACTS.

Ráma asked:—

"Will you Sir, that art versed in all knowledge, kindly explain the true sense of destiny in popular use."

2. Vasistha replied:—It is a man's activity and no other, O Rághava, that is the cause of all his actions, and the recipient of their consequence, wherein destiny has nothing to do.

3. Destiny is a mere imaginary thing, which neither exists nor acts nor feels (their effects). It is neither seen nor regarded (by any body).

4. The good or bad result which proceeds from the accomplished acts of successful activity, is expressed by the word destiny.

5. The wished for and unwished for consequences resulting from the good and bad deeds of human activity, are termed the effects of destiny by people.

6. Human activity which is the only cause of some unavoidable future consequence, is called as destiny by the majority of mankind.

7. Truly, O Rághava! destiny though void as vacuity, appears as real to some body, who thinks it to be an active agent, while others know it to be inactive.

8. Again destiny is a mere saying uttered by men upon the result of 197450 some good or bad effect of their actual exertion, that "it is this 197451 which has produced the other."

197452
197453 9. It is my belief and I have known it for certain that, destiny is 197454 no more than the word uttered by people upon their attainment of the 197455 object of their exertions.

197456
197457 10. Destiny is that word of consolation which is uttered by men, as 197458 significant of the good or evil which they meet with and which they 197459 call to be the effect of the other.

197460
197461 11. Rāma asked:—How is it sir, that you who are all wise, do now
197462 contradict your own assertion that destiny is the result of the stock
197463 of our former acts (of past life)?

197464
197465 12. Vasishtha answered saying:—Well said O Rāma! you know every thing;
197466 but hear me tell you the whole of it, whereby you will have a firm
197467 belief in the nullity of destiny.

197469 13. All the various desires which men may have entertained in their 197470 minds before, even those come to be accounted as his deeds (or mental 197471 actions) at last.

197472
197473 14. All animals are seen also to act according to their desires, and to 197474 do nothing to which an inclination was wanting in their natures.

197475
197476 15. As the villager goes to his village and the townsman comes to 197477 the town: so it is the nature of the desire that leads men to their 197478 particular acts.

197479
197480 16. The keen and firm resolution with which an act was done in the 197481 former state of life, that verily is termed destiny in the successive 197482 births, or generations of living beings.

197483
197484 17. Thus are the acts of all active beings conformable with their 197485 natures, and the actions of men are in accordance to their desires, the 197486 desire is no other than the mind itself, and the mind is self-same with 197487 the human soul.

197488
197489 18. The mind is the soul and cause of all acts which they call the 197490 doings of destiny, certainly there is no other thing as destiny beside 197491 the mind.

197492
197493 19. This mind is verily the living soul, which acts as it desires, and 197494 enjoys accordingly the fruits thereof, and is same with destiny.

197495
197496 20. Know Rāma that the mind, the heart, desire, action and destiny are 197497 synonymous terms, and applied by the virtuous to the unascertainable
197498 soul (evolved in these forms).

197499
197500 21. Now whatever the so named soul undertakes to do continually and 197501 with a firm resolution, it obtains the fruit thereof accordingly.

197503 22. It is by means of the activity or exertion of this soul, and by no
197504 other means, O support of Raghu's race, that it obtains everything, and 197505 may it lead you to your good only.

197506
197507 23. Rāma said:—Being caught in the net of my pre-existent desire, I 197508 remain a captive to them and do as they lead me to. Say then, O sage 197509 what else I can do.

197510
197511 24. Vasishtha replied:—So then O Rāma, you will be able to reach to 197512 your lasting good, if you will but exert your activity for it, without 197513 which there is no other way to it.

197514
197515 25. These desires are of two kinds, some leading to good and others to 197516 evil. Hence the desire of one's prior state must have been of one kind 197517 or other.

197518

26. If you will be guided now by the pure desires (of your nature), you will be gradually led by means of your good acts to attain the state of your lasting welfare.

27. But if your wrong inclinations tend to lead you to difficulties, you must try your best to overcome such propensities _perforce_.

28. You Rāma are wise and perfectly intelligent, and not composed of a dull (material) body only; now if you should be in need of another's guidance to waken your intellect, say where lies your own intelligence.

29. If you would have one to enlighten your understanding, say where is that another to illumine him, and who is the other to illuminate him also. Hence as no one is wholly devoid of understanding, let him improve it himself.

30. The current of our desires is flowing betwixt the two channels of good and evil; it must be by exertion of our activity that we must turn it to the right course.

31. You who are the mightiest of the mighty, must exert the force of your activity to turn your mind to a profitable course from its direction to the profitless.

32. By directing the mind to the right way from the wrong, it will take the right course and so the _vice versa_. But as human mind is as (tender as) a child, it must not be employed by force (but gentle measures).

33. The training of the child like that of the mind, is effected slowly by gentleness and indulgence, and not by force and hurry.

34. You have already by your constant practice, got a mastery over all your good and bad desires; you have hence forward to direct your tendencies to good only.

35. O victorious Rāma! When by your pristine habits you have an aptitude to do what is good, learn that it is the result of your good nature.

36. O sinless Rāma, your desires are at present lying dormant in your mind, and require some practice to be employed only to the doing of good.

37. If you will not exert yourself at present to improve your dormant desires by constant practice, you can never expect to be happy.

38. When it is doubtful (to know the nature of the innate propensity), do you incline to what is good, and as you thrive in this, you shall have no evil to fear.

39. Whatever one practices, he becomes perfect in that in time; as studying from childhood makes the learned free from error.

40. When you have the good will in you, you must accomplish your purpose, by means of your activity and subjection of the organs of your body.

41. So long as your mind is imperfect and unacquainted with the state of divine truth, you must attend to your teacher, books and reasoning, and act according to their directions (in the paths of truth).

42. Having first finished your acts and known the truth, you must abandon even your meritorious deeds, and all your desires with them.

43. Having known by your good understanding, that the virtuous course led by honorable men is truly good, give particular attention to know the nature of God, then forsake even that (enquiry), and remain (silent) as a saint (_muni_).

CHAPTER X.

DESCENSION OF KNOWLEDGE.

Vasistha resumed:—

This thing called destiny is as true as the reality of God. It is the cause of causes and effect of effects. (It is an attribute of God).

2. Now attend to my words and depend on your exertions, and intently apply your ever confident mind to the attainment of your chief good.

3. Try your exertions to turn to your subjection the misleading senses from pursuing their objects.

4. I will now propound to you a code containing of the essence of the best means of liberation, which will confer the fruits of your exertions and lead you to your welfare in both worlds.

5. Let them that have great minds, forsake their worldly desires in order to avoid their future births, and attend to these lectures with calm contentment (in their minds).

6. Weigh well the meanings of the antecedent and subsequent propositions, repress your mind from its worldly cares, and dispose your self to equanimity for its inquiry after truth.

7. Hear me relate to you Ráma, the way to emancipation, which will remove your feelings of pain and pleasure, and become the surest means to lead you to supreme happiness.

8. On hearing this lecture on liberation in the company of all those reasonable men, you will know that highest state which is free from pain, and of which there is no termination.

9. This was spoken of old in a former _Kalpa_ age by Brahmá abiding in the Supreme spirit. It is the remover of all anxiety and giver of all comfort to the soul.

10. Ráma asked saying:—Say O Bráhma—that art my guide, what cause moved Brahmá himself of old to reveal this knowledge, and in what manner was it obtained by you.

11. Vasishtha replied:—The supreme soul of infinite manifestations exists by itself; it passes through and supports the whole in the form of vacuity and understanding, and as light to all living beings.

12. From him who remains the same (unaltered being) in his rest and motion, the great Vishnu was born, like a moving wave on the quiet waters of the sea.

13. Then was Brahmá produced from the lotus of his heart, having the mount Meru for its pericarp, and the points of the compass for its petals, and the stars for its pistils.

14. He being beset by gods and sages acquainted with the Vedas and their significations, created all the worlds and the minds with their various thoughts.

15. He then created the groups of men in the Bhárata division (India) in a corner of Jambudwípa (Asia), and subjected them to all manner of diseases and afflictions.

16. They are also troubled with the possession and want of many things, and their subjection to dangers and diseases. Here all species of created beings are subjected to a variety of tribulations and afflictions.

17. The lord and creator of worlds, seeing the misery of these people, felt compassion for them, as a father does for his children.

18. He then pondered within himself for a moment with intensity of thought and for the good of all creatures, how to exterminate the misery of these beings who were subjected to death and despair.

19. With this thought the lord god (Brahmá), established himself the rules of austerity, piety, charity, veracity and pilgrimage.

20. Having established these, the lord and creator again thought within himself, how to make an end of the many miseries of the men he had created.

21. He thought upon self-extinction as the Supreme bliss, which was obtainable only through a knowledge of the Deity, and whereby man might be exempted from repeated births and deaths.

22. It was divine knowledge, he thought, the only means of men's crossing over (the ocean) of this world; but austerity, charity and pilgrimage were no means to it. (But mere preparatives to knowledge).

23. Upon this said he "I will immediately make a new and sure bridge for the salvation of men and for their liberation from pain."

24. Having thought so, the lord Brahmá sitting on the lotus, meditated in his mind, and produced me from himself.

25. Being thus produced, I stood forthwith in the presence of my progenitor, as a wave rising from the sea leans towards it.

26. I then bowed down to the god who held a water-pot in one hand and a rosary in the other, with a pitcher and a bead of seeds in my either hand, and was thus addressed by him.

27. Come my son said he, and then holding me with his hand, made me sit on the northern petal of his lotus of truth, which shone as bright as the moon amidst the silvery clouds.

28. Wearing the skin of an antelope, Brahmá my father, spoke to me who was in the like habit, with the voice of a gander addressing a stork (_i.e._ a talkative person addressing a mute one).

29. He said "I will for a moment overpower thy fickle-mindedness under a mist of insensibility, as a dark cloud overshadows the disk of the moon."

30. It was under this imprecation that I lost my reason and forgot every thing, even the clear idea I had of God.

31. I then became as helpless as one out of his wits, and came to be afflicted with distress and sorrow like an indigent person.

32. Ah woeful is this world! said I, and how came evil to dwell in it? With these thoughts I remained in silence (pondering on the origin of evil).

33. Then he my father spoke to me saying: Ah my son, why art thou so afflicted? Ask of me the remedy for thy affliction, and thou shalt become happy.

34. Then the lord creator of all peoples was asked by me, seated as I had been on the gold-coloured leaflet of the lotus, about the medicine of worldly woes.

197726 35. How came, said I, O my lord, this world to be so full of misery, 197727 and how can people get rid of it, is what I ask of thee (to know).
197728
197729 36. I then learnt the most holy wisdom which Bráhma my father 197730 delivered to me, and following his advice, I became quite composed (in 197731 my mind).
197732
197733 37. Then the Creator of the world and revealer of all causes, seeing me
197734 knowing the knowable and restored to my own natural state said:—
197735
197736 38. I had turned thee to insanity my son, by an illusion, in order 197737 to make thee an enquirer into the essence of true knowledge for the 197738 welfare of mankind.
197739
197740 39. Now art thou released from the curse of illusion, and arrived to 197741 thy highest state of understanding. Thou hast become as one soul (with 197742 the Supreme), and art as pure gold (after its purification from dross).
197743
197744 40. Now shut thy heart against the world, and proceed to the land of 197745 Bharata on the surface of the earth for the good of mankind.
197746
197747 41. There employ thyself to ceremonial duties to the best of thy 197748 knowledge; and advise others to ritual acts in their proper order (of 197749 exoteric faith).
197750
197751 42. But such as are disgusted (with the world) in their hearts, and are 197752 rational with their elevated understandings, are to be counseled to 197753 esoteric knowledge which confers true felicity (to man).
197754
197755 43. Being thus appointed by him who was born in the lotus, I continue 197756 to abide herein throughout the succession of beings. (_i.e._ for ages).
197757
197758 44. I have no duty to perform here, but live while I have to live free 197759 from all cares. I do my acts always with as tranquil a mind as it were 197760 in a state of sleep; I do my works with the body; but I do nothing here
197761 with my soul (which is fixed in God).
197762
197763
197764
197765
197766
197767

CHAPTER XI.

ON THE QUALIFICATIONS OF THE INQUIRER AND LECTURER.

197768
197769
197770
197772

197773 I have thus related to you fully about the descent of knowledge on 197774 earth, with the reason of my birth and the intention of the lotus born
197775 Brahmá (in making me his apostle).
197776

197777 2. Now Ráma, as you are eager to learn the transcendental knowledge, 197778 and feel so great an anxiety for it in your mind, it must be the effect
197779 of your pristine merit.
197780

197781 3. Ráma said:—How was it sir, that the Supreme lord felt a desire to 197782 send down knowledge on earth after his creation of it (and not along 197783 with it?)
197784

197785 4. Vasishtha replied:—This Brahmá is in his own nature the same with 197786 the Supreme Brahm, and is born in him, as a billow is born of the 197787 waters of the deep. (The co-eternal _logos_).
197788

197789 5. This great lord saw the imperfection of his creation, and saw its 197790 whole course (at one view) in times past, present and future. (The 197791 perversion of mankind subsequent to their fall).
197792

197793 6. He saw the decay of ceremonial rites after the end of the Satya 197794 (golden) and other ages, and considering the error to which men were to 197795 fall afterward, he felt pity for their states (for want of sacrifices).

197796

197797 7. Then the Lord thought of endowing me with true knowledge, and sent 197798 me on the surface of the earth for dispelling the ignorance of mankind.
197799

197800 8. Like me he has sent also some other great sages here, as Sanat 197801 Kumára, Nárada and many others also.
197802

197803 9. He has sent them all for the redemption of mankind from the fetters
197804 of their ignorance by a series of meritorious acts, and their progress 197805 in divine knowledge also.
197806

197807 10. These great sages seeing at the end of the past golden age, the 197808 gradual decay of the holy ritualistic rites on earth:
197809

197810 11. They created the rulers of earth at different divisions of the 197811 land, for regulating the course of duties, and observing their proper 197812 limits (of action).
197813

197814 12. They have made many works on the traditional law and sacrificial 197815 rules to be observed on earth, and many appropriate provisions for the 197816 accomplishment of religious and temporal duties (in the smritis).
197817

197818 13. But in the revolution of time, all these duties became slack in 197819 their course, and men have no other thought except that of seeking 197820 their daily maintenance.
197821

197822 14. Every day disputes are rising among the land-owners on account of 197823 their estates and properties, and the people are subjected to various 197824 penalties in large numbers.
197825

197826 15. In such a state, it is not possible for the rulers to rule over 197827 their states without fighting with one another, when they with their 197828 subjects are inevitably reduced to wretchedness (by warfare).
197829

197830 16. In order to remove the impotence (of such princes), and to lead 197831 them to a comprehensive view of things, we have prescribed to them many 197832 excellent precepts of knowledge.
197833

197834 17. It was the spiritual knowledge which had been at first propounded
197835 to princes; but it came afterwards to be known under the title of royal 197836 science (polity).
197837

197838 18. This royal science is of a recondite nature, and is also the best 197839 kind of spiritual knowledge. Many kings have been set beyond the reach 197840 of calamity by a knowledge of this science.
197841

197842 19. It is after many such fair-famed princes that have gone by, that 197843 your mighty self was begotten by the present king Dasaratha.
197844

197845 20. O slayer of your enemies, I find a very agreeable and holy kind of 197846 apathy growing spontaneously in your most clear understanding.
197847

197848 21. There is another kind of cold-heartedness, O Ráma, which is caused 197849 (by some sorrow) in the minds of the virtuous and reasonable men, that 197850 is styled their casual indifference.
197851

197852 22. But your unprecedented and astonishing apathy, which is produced 197853 without any cause and by your reason only, is called real stoicism by 197854 the wise.
197855

197856 23. Seeing the obnoxiousness of worldly things, what man will not grow
197857 averse to them? The best displacency to them, is what rises in the mind 197858 of one from his own judgment.
197859

197860 24. They are reckoned as great men and greatly wise also, whose 197861 indifference springs without any cause (of detestation to the world), 197862 and whose minds are clear (of all gloomy thoughts).
197863

197864 25. One whose mind feels a disgust (to the world) from its own 197865 judgement and nice discrimination (of things), is as graceful to see as 197866 the youthful bridegroom adorned with chaplets of flowers.
197867

197868 26. They are esteemed as the best of men, who betake themselves to 197869 indifference after judicious consideration of the worldly troubles.
197870

197871 27. It must be by one's repeated and judicious examination of the 197872 inward and outward illusions (of this world), that he should forcibly 197873 withdraw himself from them.
197874

197875 28. Who is there that feels not an aversion to worldliness at the 197876 doleful sight of a funeral event? It is that aversion however, which is 197877 born of itself that is highly commendable.
197878

197879 29. I see you are sincerely indifferent, and reaching the acme of true
197880 greatness. You are worthy of the best knowledge as is the moist earth 197881 of receiving the seeds.
197882

197883 30. It is by the grace of the Lord God and Supreme spirit, that a lucky 197884 understanding like yours, naturally inclines to reason.
197885

197886 31. It is by performance of ritual duties and observance of the 197887 prescribed rules, that the demerits of former births are expunged.
197888

197889 32. Upon expurgation of former demerits, the understanding turns of 197890 itself to take cognizance of spiritual matters, like the simultaneous 197891 flight of the crow towards the falling fruit of the palm.
197892

197893 33. But those that are devoted only to ritual acts, are like persons 197894 plunged in an eddy, wherein they are whirled up and down until they 197895 come to perceive the state of supreme (felicity).
197896

197897 34. Seeing this (illusory) state of the world, a man must shake off the 197898 delusion of his worldly-mindedness, just as the elephant breaks loose 197899 from his fetters.
197900

197901 35. It is too intricate, O Ráma! to understand the course of this 197902 boundless world, and not even the greatest of embodied beings (as man)
197903 can know it without true knowledge.
197904

197905 36. Know, O support of Raghu's race! that men of great understandings 197906 have got over the unfordable ocean of the world by means of the raft of 197907 their knowledge and reason.
197908

197909 37. Now hear with attention and steadiness of your mind, this rational 197910 knowledge for your deliverance from the flood of this world.
197911

197912 38. The unceasing excitements of the senses and the fears and miseries 197913 of the world, will continually disturb the mind, without the remedy of 197914 right reason.
197915

197916 39. There is naught beside rational knowledge, that can enable holy men 197917 to endure the afflictions of the opposite extremes of heat and cold and 197918 wind and rain.
197919

197920 40. The incessant cares and miseries which befall to men at every step, 197921 serve sometimes to torment the ignorant mind as a flame of fire burns
197922 away the straw.
197923

197924 41. But the troubles of this world can not afflict the wise man, who 197925 knows the knowable, and discerns all things (in their true light); just 197926 as it is impossible for the flame of fire to burn down a wood drenched
197927 by the rains.
197928

197929 42. The man knowing the truth resembles the firm arbor of the oak 197930 (Kalpa), which no whirlwind of disease or distress, raised by the hot 197931 winds of this desert of the world, has the power to upset.
197932

43. The intelligent man who has a mind to know the truth, must diligently serve his wise preceptor with loving regard.
44. The sayings of the well-minded preceptor who is asked about anything, must be carefully preserved in the mind, as a piece of fine muslin receives the dye (with which it is dyed).
45. O best of the eloquent, you must not receive the instruction of one unacquainted with truth himself; whoever asks him anything is the greatest of fools.
46. Whoever does not carefully attend to the words of the truth-telling preceptor who is asked about anything, is the basest of men.
47. He is the best inquirer who makes his enquiry of one after ascertaining by his deeds whether he knows the knowable or not.
48. But he is reckoned a vile inquirer and incapable of knowing great things, who makes a boyish query without ascertaining the lecturer's (qualifications).
49. The wise man when asked, will reply to him who is able to comprehend the antecedent and subsequent propositions, and is possessed of a good understanding; but he should make no answer to a vile brutish being.
50. The preceptor who gives his lecture without examining the capacity of the inquirer to grasp his meaning, is pronounced unwise by the learned.
51. O delight of Raghu's race! this our meeting is a very congenial one and well adapted to each other, wherein you as inquirer are an admirer of virtue, and I the speaker, am well acquainted (with the subject).
52. You that understand the meaning of words, should well consider all what I tell you, and take them to your heart.
53. You are truly great and disgusted with the world, and know the truth among mankind; whatever is spoken to you must be impressed in your mind as the red dye on muslin.
54. You by your attention to what I say and discrimination of spiritual matters, can make your understanding receive my instruction as the waters reflect the sun-light.
55. Receive all that I say and store them diligently in your mind; or else it is useless to ask me anything.
56. The mind, O Rāma! is as fickle as an ape in the forest, correct it carefully and attend to spiritual instruction.
57. Keep yourself always from the injudicious and ignorant, and those addicted to the company of wicked people, and honour the virtuous.
58. It is by association with good people that we can gain wisdom, which resembles a tree yielding the fruits both of enjoyment and liberation (_i.e._, both of worldly and future good).
59. There are four guards said to keep watch at the gate of Liberation, namely: peace, judgment, contentment and the society of the good.
60. All these or three or two of them are to be attended with care, because they shall open to you the door leading to the abode of liberation.
61. Or at last one of them is to be resorted to with diligence and even at the expense of one's life; because by securing one of these a man can reconcile and gain all the four (to his favour).

62. The wise man is the receptacle of all Sástras and Srutis, of all knowledge and austerity, and is a gem on earth, as the sun is the receptacle of light (and gem of heaven).
63. The dull understanding of the senseless man becomes as stiff as a (motionless) block, and like the frozen water becoming as hard as stone.
64. Your good nature and good qualities, O Ráma! and the counsels of the learned in the Sástras, have made you sit here with a heart blooming like lotus at the rising sun.
65. Your lifted ears to hear these wise lectures, have enabled you to repress your thoughts; as the music of the lute attracts the mind of the deer.
66. Now secure, O Ráma! the treasures of peace and good nature by your practice of indifference of which there is no decay.
67. Your knowledge of the attainment of liberation will be increased by your attending to the Sástras and the society of good men, as also by your practice of austerity and self subjection.
68. You must know that, it is the study of divine knowledge with a clear understanding, that is a sure remedy against ignorance.
69. Know this world to be a poisonous plant and seat of dangers. It infects the ignorant at all times, unless one will take the pains to dispel his darkness.
70. Avarice accompanied by ignorance moves within the heart in a serpentine course, and expands and contracts it by turns like the bellows of a blacksmith.
71. The true light of things dawns only in the minds of the wise, as the gentle moon appears to sight only in the clear and cloudless sky.
72. He is truly called a man who can judge (the truth) by the major and minor propositions, whose mind is expanded and fraught with brilliant ingenuity.
73. Ráma! the clear wisdom of your mind, makes you shine as the full moon dispelling the darkness of the cloudless sky by her cooling and translucent beams.

CHAPTER XII.

GREATNESS OF TRUE KNOWLEDGE.

Vasishtha said:—

Ráma! I honor you as one of a perfect mind. You know what to ask, and understand what is spoken to you. I will therefore go on speaking respectfully to you.

2. Be still to attend to knowledge by keeping your mind fixed in yourself, and being freed from pride and passions, incline yourself to pure truth.

3. You are possessed of all the qualities of an enquirer, and I those of the speaker, in as much as there are gems in the ocean.

4. You have gained my son the insouciance which is cognate with reason, like the humidity of the moonstone bearing its correlation with the gentle beams of the moon.

5. Ráma! your long and early practiced pure virtues and good qualities, have raised your fame, as the long stretching white fibers of the stalk exalt the spotless lotus.
6. Now hear the words I tell you Ráma; for you alone are fit to receive them, as the moon only is able to open the _Kumuda_ petals.
7. Whatever business or investigation is undertaken by any body, it must be brought to a happy close, tending to his peace and tranquility (or to his rest and quiet).
8. Had not there been the solace of philosophy for men of good understanding, what rational being could dare to bear the misery brought on in this world by ignorance.
9. All the faculties of the mind are absorbed in the contemplation of the Supreme, like the dissolution of the rocks of boundary mountains by the solar heat at the end of the (_Kalpa_) world.
10. Ráma! the intolerable cholic pain caused by this venomous world, is healed only by _yoga_ meditation, as the poison of snake-biting is removed by _Garuda_ incantations.
11. The capacity of _yoga_ is obtained by discussion of the Sástras in the company of good people, which alone can furnish us with the great charm of spiritual knowledge.
12. It must be owned that we lessen our woes by acting with reason: therefore reasonable men are never to be looked upon with disregard.
13. The reasoning man gets released from his worldly sickness, and quits his frame which is full of diseases, as a snake casts off his time worn slough; and looks with a placid mind and calm composure upon the magic scenes of the world. Hence the fully wise man is not subject to the misery of the imperfectly wise.
14. The rough and uneven pleasure of the world is but a disease to men, and stings them like a snake. It cuts them as a sword, and pierces them as a spear. It binds them fast as by a rope, and burns them as with the fire, and blindfolds their understanding as in the darkness of the night. It makes them as prostrate and dull as a slab of stone. It destroys one's prudence and lowers his position. It casts them into the pit of error, and torments them with avarice. Thus there is almost no kind of trouble which does not betide worldly minded men.
15. Worldliness is as dangerous a disease as cholera, which unless it is healed in time, is sure to trouble its patient with the torments of hell:—
16. Such as those caused by the eating of stones, wounds of swords and spears; being pelted with stones, burnt by fire, and numbed by frost; loosing of limbs, besmearing the body with blood as with sandal paste; by being bored by worms as worm-eaten trees, and pricked in the body by pikes and broomsticks, or pierced by the fiery shafts and bolts continually falling in battle. By toiling and moiling in the sun and working in cold and rain as in a summer fountain house; or remaining dumb and deaf and without rest or sleep, and finally by loosing the head (in war or penalty).
17. Under thousands of such intolerable pangs of worldly life, no one should remain negligent of his release from this state; but ought to think that it is his reflection in the Sástras only, that can produce his real good.
18. Look here Ráma! on these great sages and Rishis, these Bráhmans and princes, who having fortified themselves by the armour of wisdom, and being liable to no pain or grief; have yet engaged themselves to the arduous affairs of this world with minds as placid as yours.

198140 19. Moreover there are many of the best of men, who with their 198141 spiritual light and pure understandings, reside in this world as the 198142 gods Hari, Hara and Brahmá, who were above all concerns and fluctuating 198143 desires of life.

198144
198145 20. The journey of this world is delightful to one, who after the 198146 removal of his errors and dispersion of the cloud of his ignorance, has 198147 come to the knowledge of truth.

198148
198149 21. That the serenity of the mind and calm repose of the heart being 198150 secured, all the senses are subjected to peace, and every thing is 198151 viewed in an equal light; and this knowledge of the truth gives a 198152 delight to our journey in this world.

198154 22. Know also that, this body of ours is the car, and these organs are 198155 its horses, our breathings are the winds blowing upon it, and the mind 198156 is the driver that feels the delight of driving; the atomic soul is the 198157 rider who is conscious of wandering about the world. The knowledge of 198158 this truth makes our earthly journey a pleasant one.

198159 198160 198161 198162 198163 CHAPTER XIII.

198164 198165 ON PEACE AND TRANQUILITY OF MIND.

198167
198168 Intelligent men that have seen the spirit, fix their sight upon it, and 198169 rove about in the world as persons of great and elevated souls.

198170
198171 2. They (that are liberated in this life), neither grieve nor wish nor 198172 ask for aught of good or evil (in this world). They do their works as 198173 if doing nothing (_i.e._ with indifference).

198174
198175 3. Those that rely on themselves, remain both quietly, as well as act
198176 their parts with a calm serenity (of their minds); and take no concern 198177 either for what is noxious or delectable to them.

198178
198179 4. Their coming and not coming, going and not going, doing or not 198180 doing, and speaking or not speaking are alike indifferent to them.

198181
198182 5. Whatever acts or sights may appear pleasant or disgusting to any 198183 body, cease to affect them in any way after they have come to know
198184 their God (as the Author of all good).

198185
198186 6. The mind getting rid of its desires feels a sweet composure 198187 associated with a bliss as if descending from the heavenly orb of the 198188 moon all about it.

198189
198190 7. By being unmindful of worldly affairs and regardless of all its 198191 excitements, the soul is filled with a felicity resembling the 198192 ambrosial waters in the moon.

198194 8. He who ceases to act his magical parts (in this playground of the 198195 earth), and desists from following his inclinations and childish 198196 pranks, shines forth in his spiritual light.

198197
198198 9. Such are the powers gained from spiritual knowledge, and by no other 198199 means whatever.

198200
198201 10. Therefore should a man try to seek and know and adore the Supreme 198202 soul, by means of his reasoning powers during life.

198203
198204 11. It is the concordance of one's belief with the precepts of the 198205 Sástra and his instructor, joined with his constant meditation, that 198206 can give him a full view of the Supreme spirit.

198207
198208 12. The fool slighting the Sástra and its instructions, and disregarding the counsels of great men, are exposed to difficulties and dangers from which they can have no release.

13. There is no disease nor poison, nor trouble nor affliction, so painful to one in this earth, as the ignorance which is bred in himself.

14. Those whose intellects are a little purified, will find this work to be of greater efficacy to dispel their ignorance than any other _Sástra_.

15. This Sástra with its beautiful examples and pleasing lessons and want of discordance, should be diligently attended to by every body who is a friend to good sayings and their senses.

16. Want of dignity, inextricable difficulties, baseness and degeneracy, are all offsprings of ignorance, as the thorns are the offshoots of the prickly _Ketaki_ plant.

17. It is far better, O Ráma! to rove about a begging with a pot in hand to the abodes of the vile Chandálas, than lead a life deadened by ignorance.

18. Rather dwell in dark dismal cells or dry dreary wells, and in the hollow of trees, or remain as solitary blind worms (under the ground), than labour under the miseries of ignorance.

19. The man receiving the light leading to his liberation, will never fall into the darkness of error or gloom of death.

20. So long will chill frost of penury continue to contract the lotus of humanity, as the clear light of reason does not shine upon the mind like the sun.

21. One must know the true nature of the soul both from his preceptor and the evidence of the Sástras, as also from friends like ourselves, for the sake of liberating himself from the misery of the world.

22. Try O Ráma! to imitate those that are liberated in their life time, who are free to roam about like the gods Hari, Hara, and others, and as the holy sages among Bráhmans.

23. Here (on earth) our miseries are as endless as atoms, and our happiness as little as a drop of water on the stalk of a straw; therefore do not fix your sight upon that little happiness which is beset by misery.

24. But let the intelligent man diligently apply himself to the attainment of that state of endless happiness which is free from pain and constitutes his highest consummation.

25. They are reckoned the best of men and deserving of consummation, whose minds are freed from the fever (of worldly cares), and attached to the transcendental state (of ultimate beatitude).

26. Those base minded mortals that are satisfied with their enjoyments, eating and drinking, and the pleasures of their worldly possessions, are reckoned as stark-blind frogs (in a well).

27. All who are attached to the company of imposters and wicked men, as of those that are addicted to the practice of evil deeds, and are enemies in the garb of friendship, and are given up to gluttony:—

28. Such foolish men of mistaken and stupid minds fall into the hardest of hardships, to the misery of miseries, and the horror of horrors and the hell of hells.

29. Happiness and misery destroy and succeed each other by turns, and are as fleeting as flashes of lightnings. Hence it is impossible to be happy for ever.

- 198278
198279 30. Those great souls who are indifferent and well judging like 198280 yourself, are known as the most honourable of men, and worthy alike 198281 both of temporal enjoyments and spiritual emancipation.
198282
- 198283 31. By reliance upon right reasoning joined with a habit of 198284 dispassionateness, men are enabled to get over the dark and dangerous
198285 torrents of this world.
198286
- 198287 32. No man of reason should allow himself to sleep (in negligence)
198288 amidst the illusions of the world, well knowing their noxious property
198289 to derange the understanding.
198290
- 198291 33. Whoso remains neglectful in his worldliness, resembles a man 198292 sleeping negligent on a grassy bed when his house is on fire.
198293
- 198294 34. What being arrived at, there is no returning from it; and what 198295 being gained, there is no cause of sorrowing; that state is undoubtedly 198296 attainable by divine knowledge only; and is a certain truth.
198297
- 198298 35. Should there be no such future state, yet there is no harm to 198299 believe in it; but if there be such a state, its belief will save you 198300 from the (dreadful) ocean of this world.
198301
- 198302 36. Whenever a man is inclined to think on the means of his salvation, 198303 he is sure to be soon entitled to his liberation.
198304
- 198305 37. The undecaying, unerring and fearless state of tranquility, is no 198306 where to be had in the three worlds, without one's union (with the 198307 Supreme).
198308
- 198309 38. Having gained that best of gains, no one is liable to the pain from 198310 which no wealth, friend or relation can save any body.
198311
- 198312 39. Neither the actions of one's hands and feet in his offerings and 198313 pilgrimage to distant lands, nor the bodily pains of asceticism, nor 198314 his refuge in a holy place can serve his salvation.
198315
- 198316 40. It is only by means of one's best exertions and the fixing of his 198317 mind to one object, as also by the subjection of his desires, that the 198318 ultimate state (of bliss) can be arrived at.
198319
- 198320 41. So it is by means of discrimination, reasoning and ultimate 198321 ascertainment of truth, that a man may avoid the snares of misery, and 198322 attain his best state.
198323
- 198324 42. One sitting at ease in his seat and meditating within himself (the 198325 nature of the soul), attains the blissful state, which is free from 198326 sorrow and future birth.
198327
- 198328 43. All holy men are known to be situated beyond the bounds of the 198329 frail pleasures (of this life); their optimum quiescence is reckoned 198330 the ultimate bliss.
198331
- 198332 44. They have given up all thoughts both of humanity and heaven 198333 (_i.e._ of both worlds), which are devoid of true felicity as the 198334 mirage is void of water.
198335
- 198336 45. Therefore should one think of subduing his mind, and resort to 198337 peace and contentment as the means (to happiness); these joined with an 198338 unbounded equanimity produce true happiness.
198339
- 198340 46. It is not to be had by sitting (quietly at home), or going up and 198341 down (from place to place); and neither by wandering (in pilgrimage), 198342 nor prostrating (before the altar). It is not to be acquired by the 198343 Rákshasas, demons, deities or ignorant-men.
198344
- 198345 47. That ultimate felicity is born of and obtainable from the peace of 198346 mind: it is the fruit of the high arbor of reason from its blossom of 198347 peace.

198348
198349 48. Those that are engaged in worldliness but do not mix in it like the 198350 all-illuminating sun, are known as the best of men.

198351
198352 49. The mind that is at peace and rest, that is clear and free from 198353 errors, and without any attempt or desire, doth neither forsake nor 198354 wish for the world.

198355
198356 50. Hear me tell you of the warders at the gate of salvation in their 198357 order, some one of which being secured, one may have his entrance into 198358 it.

198359
198360 51. Thirst after pleasure is a state of protracted disease, and this 198361 world is full of mirage (all parched and dry). It is equanimity alone 198362 that can cool this dryness as the moistening beams of the moon.

198363
198364 52. It is quiescence which leads to all good and is reckoned the best 198365 state of being. Quietism is felicity, it is peace and the preventive of 198366 error.

198368 53. The man who lives content with his quiet and a calm clearness of 198369 his soul, with a mind fraught with stoicism, makes friends of his 198370 enemies.

198371
198372 54. Those whose minds are adorned with the moon light of quietism, feel 198373 a flux of the beams of purity rising in them like the hoary waves of 198374 the milky ocean.

198376 55. Those holy men who have the lotus-like flower of quietism growing 198377 in the lotiform receptacle of their hearts, are said to have a 198378 secondary heart like the two _pericardiums_ of the god Hari (holding 198379 Brahmá in one of them).

198381 56. They whose untainted faces shine as the moon with the lustre of 198382 quiescence, are to be honoured as the luminaries of their families, 198383 and ravishers of the senses of others by the charming beauty of their 198384 countenance.

198386 57. Whatever is beautiful in the three worlds, and in the shape of 198387 imperial prosperity and grandeur, there is nothing in them that can 198388 afford a happiness equal to that of quietism.

198389
198390 58. Whatever misery, anxiety and intolerable difficulty (may overtake a 198391 man), they are lost in the tranquil mind like darkness in the sun.

198392
198393 59. The mind of no living being is so delighted with moon beams, as 198394 that of the peaceful man from his heart-felt joy.

198395
198396 60. The virtuous man that is calm and quiet, and friendly to all living 198397 beings, feels the benign influence of highest truths appearing of 198398 themselves in his mind.

198400 61. As all children whether good or bad, have a strict faith in their 198401 mother, so all beings here have a reliance on the man of an even 198402 disposition.

198404 62. Neither does a cooling ambrosial draught nor the kind embrace of 198405 prosperity, afford such gratification to the soul, as one's inward
198406 satisfaction of the mind.

198407
198408 63. Whether afflicted by diseases or disasters, or dragged by the rope 198409 of avarice, do you bear up yourself, O Ráma, by the equanimity of your 198410 mind.

198411
198412 64. Whatever thou dost and eatest with the calm coolness of thy mind, 198413 all that is sweeter far to the soul than anything sweet to taste.

198414
198415 65. The mind that is overpowered by the ambrosial flavour of quietism and desists from activity, may have the body lacerated (for a time), but it will be filled up shortly.

66. Neither imps nor goblins, demons or enemies, nor tigers nor snakes, ever annoy a peaceful man.

67. He who has his mind and body well guarded by the invulnerable armour of meekness, can never be pierced by the shafts of adversity; but remains as the thunder-stone impenetrable by arrows.

68. The king seated in his palace is not so graceful to sight, as the quiet peaceful man is graced by his equanimity and clearness of understanding.

69. No one is so delighted at seeing a thing dearer than his life, as by the satisfaction which he feels at the sight of a contented and peaceful man.

70. He who lives a holy life with his gentle and peaceful conduct, is said to be truly living in this world and no other.

71. The sober minded, meek and honest man pleases every one by all that he does, and as it were captivates all beings to himself.

72. He is called the meek who neither feels pleasure or pain at the sight, touch or hearing and tasting of anything good or bad (to the senses).

73. He who is indifferent to all objects, and neither leaves nor longs for any thing; but keeps his senses and appetites under subjection, is called a saint.

74. Whoso knowing all things both internally as well as externally with a clear understanding, attends and looks to his own concerns, he is verily said to be a saint.

75. He whose mind is as calm as moon beams both at the approach of a feast or fighting, and even at the moment of death, is said to be a saint.

76. Who though present at a place, neither rejoices nor murmurs at any thing, but remains as if he were absent from it, and conducts himself as quietly as if he were fast asleep; such a one is called a saint.

77. He whose complaisant look casts a graceful nectarious radiance on all around him, is said to be a saint.

78. Who feels a cool calmness within himself, and is not disturbed or immersed in any state of life, and who though a layman is not worldly minded, such a man is termed a saint.

79. He who takes not to his mind the tribulations of this life, however long or great they may be, nor thinks this base (bodily frame) to be himself, is known to be a saint.

80. The man of the world who has a mind clear as the firmament, and not tainted (by worldliness), is said to be a saint.

81. The quiet Platonic shines forth among sages and ascetics, among priests and princes, and among the mighty and learned.

82. Great and meritorious men, whose minds are attached to Quietism, feel a rest rising in their souls like the cooling beams of the moon.

83. Quietism is the utmost limit of the assemblage of virtues, and the best decoration of manliness; it shines resplendent in all dangers and difficulties.

84. Do you now, O Ráma! follow for your perfection in the way in which high-minded men have attained their perfect state, by holding fast on quietism as an imperishable virtue, preserved by the respectable, and never to be lost or stolen by any.

CHAPTER XIV.

ON THE ASCERTAINMENT OF AN ARGUMENT.

It must be the duty of one, whose understanding is cleared and purified by a knowledge of the Sástras, to argue incessantly with a guide knowing how to reason aright.

2. The understanding when sharpened by reasoning, comes to view the transcendent state. It is reasoning which is the only best medicine for the chronic disease of worldliness.

3. The world is of the form of a wood of troubles, shooting in sprouts of endless desires which being once felled under the saw of reason, will germinate no more.

4. O wise Ráma! our understandings are shrouded under unconsciousness at the loss of our friends, at times of danger, and even of quiet. It is reason that is our only companion (at these times).

5. There is no expedient for the learned and wise except reason; it is by means of reason that the minds of good people can avoid evil and secure their good.

6. All our strength and understanding, our valour and renown, and the ends of our actions, result from our reasoning with the intelligent.

7. Reason is the lamp to show us the right and wrong, and the instrument for accomplishment of our desires:—by reliance on right reason, one crosses over easily the wide ocean of the world.

8. Pure reasoning like a strong lion, tears asunder the elephants of great error, which ravage the lotus beds of the mind (or mental faculties).

9. If ignorant men have at any time attained a better state in life, it was all owing to the light of the lamp of their reasoning.

10. Know O Rághava that, dominion and fair prosperity, together with our enjoyments and eternal salvation, are all but fruits of the celestial _Kalpa_ plant of reasoning.

11. The minds of great men, which are expanded by reasoning here, are never liable to be immersed under the currents of calamity (but float above them) like gourds upon water.

12. Those who conduct themselves with their intellects shining forth with reason, become the recipients of its most liberal gifts.

13. Want of reason is like the thorny and sour plant of _Karanja_ sprouting forth with blossoms of woe, and growing in the brakes of ignorant minds in order to shut out their hopes and prospects.

14. Do you, O Rághava! shake off the lethargy caused by your neglect of reasoning. This torpor darkens your vision as it were by the inky powder of collyrium, and maddens your mind as it were, by the ebriety of wine.

15. The man of right judgment is not liable to fall into the long and dangerous maze of error (like others); but remains as a blaze of light amidst the gloom (of ignorance).

16. The reasoning faculties shine, as a bed of lotuses in the limpid lake of the mind: whoso has such a reasoning mind, exalts his head as high as the Himálayan height.
17. The man having a dull mind and incapable of reasoning (of reason) as a flash of lightening, and like boys, sees false apparitions about him.
18. Ráma, you must shun at a distance the base unreasonable man, who grows as plump as a _Khanda_ cane to cause sorrow and resembles the spring season to grow fresh weeds of evil.
19. Whatever misdeeds, misconducts and mischances present themselves to man, they are all the effects of his want of the light of reason, and lay hold on him like ghosts appearing in the dark.
20. O support of Raghu's race, do you shun at a distance the unreasonable man of the nature of a solitary wild tree, which comes to no good use (to mankind).
21. The mind that is fraught with reason and devoid of the impatience attendant on worldly desires, feels the light of transcendent quietism shining in the soul with the full lustre of the moon.
22. When the light of reason shines in any person, it imparts the coolness and good grace of moon-beams to all things around him.
23. The reasoning power of man accompanied with the flag of divine knowledge and the silvery flapper of good understanding, shines as moon-light in the darkness of night.
24. Men with the good grace of their reason, throw a radiance like that of the sun on all sides about them, and dispel the gloom of worldliness.
25. Reasoning serves to destroy the false apparitions of errors which present themselves to the minds of boys like ghosts in the sky at night.
26. All things in the world appear as charming (as if they were realities); but they are (in fact) but unrealities, and liken the clods of earth that are broken (to pieces) by the hammering stone of reason.
27. Men are theirself tormenters by the false imagination of their own minds; it is reason alone that can drive away this inveterate spectre from the mind.
28. Know the fruit of the high arbor of reason, to be the even, unobstructed, interminable and independent happiness called _Kaivalya_.
29. It is by means of reason and its evident influence on the deprivation of (physical) gratifications, that there rises an unshaken and exalted disinterestedness in the mind, like the cooling beams of the moon.
30. When the saint has reached his perfection by means of the elixir of judgment seated in his mind, he neither desires for more nor leaves (what he has).
31. The mind relying on that state of equanimity and perceiving the clear light (of truth within itself), has neither its fall nor elevation, but enjoys its inward expansion as that of vacuum for ever.
32. One unconcerned with the world, neither gives nor receives any thing, nor feels himself elated or depressed at any event, but views every thing as an indifferent spectator.
33. He is neither torpidly cold nor does he dwell on anything internally or externally. He is neither inactive nor merged in activity.

34. He slights the loss of anything, and lives content with what he has; he is neither depressed nor elevated; but remains as full as the (tideless) sea.
35. It is in this manner that the high-souled and high-aspiring _Yogis_ conduct themselves in this world, with their fullness (of joy) and living as they are liberated in this life.
36. These saintly sages having lived as long as they like (in this earth), abandon it at last, and gain their कैवल्यeternal unity (after death).
37. The sapient man should intently consider within himself, who and whose he is, what is his family and by whom he is surrounded, and think on the remedy (of his worldliness).
38. It is the king, O Rāma! who well knows the difficult and doubtful state of the business (before him); and his success or failure depends solely on his right judgment and on nothing else.
39. It is the _dicta_ and _data_ established by the Veda and Vedānta that form the grounds of our evidence, and these are to be ascertained by our reason as by the help of a lamp in the gloom of night.
40. The bright eye-sight of reason, is neither blinded by the darkness (of night), nor dimmed by the full blaze (of the day), even when it has to view things (situated) at a distance.
41. He who is blind to reason is as one born blind, and a demented man is an object of universal pity; but the man with a reasoning soul is said to be possessed of divine eye-sight, and becomes victorious in all things (he undertakes).
42. The miraculous power of reason is acknowledged to be a divine attribute and an instrument to highest felicity; wherefore it is not to be lost sight of for a moment.
43. The man graced by reason is loved even by the great, as the delicious and ripe mango fruit is delectable to all.
44. Men with their minds illumed by the light of reason, are like travellers acquainted with their way, and are not liable to pit falls of incessant danger and misery.
45. Neither doth the sickman nor one beset by a hundred evils wail so bitterly, as the ignorant man whose soul is deprived of reason.
46. Rather leap as a frog in the mud, or creep as a worm in the dirt, rather lie as a snake in a dark cell or crawl on the ground, than walk as a man devoid of reason.
47. Therefore get rid of unreasonableness which is the abode of all your dangers, is reprobated by the wise (as the bane of mankind), and is the terminus of all your calamities.
48. Great men must always be in full possession of their reasoning, because those unsupported by their reason are liable to fall into the pits of darkness.
49. Let every one keep his soul under the control (of his own reason), and by this means, deliver the fawn of his mind from falling into the mirage of this world.
50. It is the province of reasoning to consider logically in one's self, whence the evil, known as worldliness, had its rise.
51. The thick mist of error is only for the continued misery of man, and it prevails on the stony minds of those that are demented by the loss of reason.

198692
198693 52. The wise that hold fast on the truth and forsake all untruth in 198694 this world, are yet unable to discern their true natures without the 198695 aid of reason.

198697 53. It is by means of reason that one comes to the knowledge of truth; 198698 and by means of truth that he gets the peace of his mind; and it is the 198699 tranquility of the mind that dispels the misery of men.

198701 54. Now Rāma, do you take delight in such acts as may be productive of 198702 utility to the world, and whereby you may arrive to perfection. Weigh 198703 all things with the clear eye of reason, which will make you blessed 198704 for ever.

198705
198706
198707
198708
198709 CHAPTER XV.

198710
198711 ON CONTENTMENT.

198712
198713
198714 Vasishtha continued:—Contentment is the chief good; contentment is 198715 called the (true) enjoyment; and the contented man, O thou destroyer of 198716 enemies, gets the best repose.

198717
198718 2. Those who are happy with their prosperity of contentment, and 198719 possess the calm repose of their souls, are as holy saints, and think a 198720 sovereignty no better than a bit of rotten straw.

198721
198722 3. Whoever retains a contented mind amidst all the affairs of the 198723 world, he is never disturbed O Rāma, in adverse circumstances nor ever 198724 dejected (in his spirit).

198725
198726 4. The saints that are satisfied with the ambrosial draught of 198727 contentment, think the highest affluence and enjoyments (of the rich)
198728 but poison (to their souls).

198729
198730 5. Even the waves of liquid nectar fail to afford that pleasure, which 198731 the sweetest taste of contentment—the healer of all evils; gives to 198732 its possessor.

198733
198734 6. Abandonment of unfruitful desires and calmness in those that are 198735 obtained, feeling no pain at and having no sense of pleasure (in any 198736 thing), constitute what is called contentment here below.

198737
198738 7. Until the mind can enjoy the contentment rising spontaneously in the 198739 soul of itself, so long will troubles continue to grow in it as briars
198740 and brambles in a bog.

198741
198742 8. The mind cooled by calm contentment, and purified by the light of 198743 philosophy, is always in its full bloom as the lotus under sun-beams.

198744
198745 9. The ungoverned mind which is under the subjection of desires and 198746 devoid of contentment, does not receive the light of knowledge, as a 198747 soiled mirror takes no reflection of the face.

198748
198749 10. The man whose mind is always bright with the sunshine of 198750 contentment, does not shrivel itself like the lotus in the dark night
198751 of ignorance (or adversity).

198752
198753 11. A man though poor, enjoys the happiness of sovereignty, who is 198754 devoid of diseases and anxieties, and whose mind is contented.

198755
198756 12. He is called a contented man, who does not long after what he is 198757 not possessed of, and enjoys what he has in its right manner, and is 198758 always graceful in his manners.

198759
198760 13. There is a beauty shining in the face of one, whose mind has the satisfaction of contentment, the fulness of magnanimity and the purity of thoughts like that of the milky ocean in it.

14. Let a man entertain his self-possession within himself, and abandon his craving of all things, by reliance on his manly exertions.

15. He whose mind is full with the ambrosia of contentment and a calm and cool understanding, acquires a perpetual composure within himself, as it were by the cooling beams of the moon.

16. All great fortunes wait on him whose mind is strengthened by contentment, as if they were his servants, and as they remain in attendance upon a king.

17. One remaining content and composed in himself, quells all his anxieties and cares, as the rains set down the dust of the earth.

18. Rāma! a man shines by the contentment of his mind and the purity of his conduct, as the cooling and spotless moon when she is full.

19. No one receives so much delight from his accumulation of wealth, as he derives from the sight of the beautiful placid countenance (of a contented person).

20. Know, O thou delight of Raghu's race! that the best of men who are decorated with grace of equanimity (the only quality that adorns the wise), are more honoured both by gods and sages than any.

CHAPTER XVI.

ON GOOD CONDUCT.

Vasishtha resumed saying:-

Know, O highly intelligent Rāma! that the company of the virtuous is everywhere of the greatest benefit to men for their crossing over the ocean of the world.

2. It is the harbour of virtuous company that produces the fresh blossom of discrimination; which being cherished by high-souled men, yields to them its fruits of prosperity.

3. The society of the learned makes solitude appear as company, and the evil of death as good as a festivity; and converts a difficulty to ease.

4. It is the society of the virtuous which wards off all disasters, that like the frost, invade the lotus beds of our hearts; and baffle the icy breath of ignorance (which deadens our souls).

5. Know the society of the virtuous to be the best improver of the understanding, the destroyer of the tree of ignorance; and remover of all our mental diseases.

6. The society of the virtuous produces the light of reason, which is as charmingly fair as a cluster of flowers after its being washed by rain-water.

7. It is the influence of virtuous company that teaches us the best mode of life, which is never impaired or obstructed by anything, and is ever full in itself.

8. Let no man ever keep himself from the association of the virtuous, though he is involved in utmost distress, and cast in irremediable circumstances.

9. The society of the virtuous, lends a light to the right path. It destroys the internal darkness of man, by the rays of the sun of knowledge.
10. Whoever has bathed in the cold and clear stream of good company is not in need of the merit derived from acts of charity, pilgrimage, austerity and sacrifice.
11. Whoever has the society of virtuous men, and whose lives are free from passions and sins, and doubts and the knots (of scruples in their hearts), of what use is (the observance of) austerity, or (performance of) pilgrimage (to him)?
12. Blessed are the peaceful in their minds, who are viewed with as great an ardour by people, as poor men fondly dote upon gems and jewels.
13. The intelligent mind with its gracefulness derived from good company, shines always as the goddess of riches in the company of fairy nymphs.
14. Therefore that blessed man is renowned as having attained the crown of a clear understanding, who never abstains himself from the company of the holy.
15. Hence all unscrupulous believers, holy men and those who are revered by people, are to be served by all means for crossing over the ocean of the world.
16. Surely do they serve as dry fuel to hell-fire, who neglect the company of the saints, which is known as rain water to extinguish the flames of hell.
17. The medicine of holy association, serves to allay entirely all the afflictions consequent to poverty and death and tribulations of worldly affairs.
18. Contentment, society of the virtuous, ratiocination and quietism, are the several means for crossing over the ocean of the world by mankind.
19. Contentment is reckoned as the best gain, good company the right course, reasoning the true knowledge, and quietism the highest bliss (of man).
20. These are the four surest means to break off the trammels of the world, and whoever is practiced in these, has surely passed over the erroneous waters of the terrestrial sea.
21. Learn, O best of the intelligent! that the practice of some one of these pure virtues, leads to an assuetude of all the four (cardinal virtues).
22. Every one of these separately is a leader to the others; wherefore diligently apply yourself to one of these for your success in getting them all.
23. Association with the good, contentment, right reasoning, and good judgment, joined with peace and tranquility, serve as cargo-ships in the ocean of the world.
24. All prosperity attends on him who is possessed of reason, contentment, quietism and the habit of keeping good company, like the fruits of the _kalpa_ tree (satisfying every desire).
25. The man possessed of reasoning, contentment, quietude, and a proclivity to keep good company, is attended by every grace, as all the digits unite in the full moon.
26. The happy mind which is fraught with contentment, quietness, reasoning power, and a tendency to good company, meets with the prosperity and success, as they attend on kings (who are) guided by (the counsels of) good ministers.

27. Therefore, O delight of Raghu's race! do you bravely govern your mind, and always practise with diligence some one of these virtues (for your conduct in life).

28. Exert your best manliness to subdue your elephantine mind, and know that until you have mastered one of these cardinal virtues, you can make no progress (in holiness).

29. It must be, O Rāma! that you shall have to set your heart to work by the exertion of your manliness and the gnashing of your teeth, for your success in meritorious deeds.

30. For whether you be a god or yaksha or a man or an arbor, you cannot, O long-armed Rāma! have a better course till then (i.e. before mastering one of these qualities).

31. As soon as one of these virtues is strengthened and made fruitful in you, it will serve to weaken the force of the faults of your ungovernable mind.

32. The cultivation of virtues leads to their full growth and suppression of vice; but the fostering of vice will (on the other hand) conduce to the increase of vices and suppression of good qualities.

33. The mind is a wilderness of errors, in which the stream of our desires is running with full force, amidst its two banks of good and evil whereon we hold our stand.

34. It bears away and throws the man on that bank which he strives to reach by his own exertion, therefore O Rāma, do as you like to reach to either shore.

35. Now try by degrees with all the exertion of your manly force, to turn the course of your desires towards the happy shore in the forest of your mind; and know, O high-minded Rāma; that one's own disposition is as a rapid current to him, which must not be permitted to bear him away (to the perilous coast).

CHAPTER XVII.

ON THE CONTENTS OF THE WORK.

Thus, O progeny of Raghu! it is the reasoning soul that is worthy of attending to the words of wisdom, as a prince (is inclined to listen) to a discourse on polity.

2. The clear and high-minded man, who has renounced the company of stupid folks, is capable of fair reasoning, as the clear sky has the capacity of receiving the moon-light.

3. You who are replete with the entire grace of this quality, should now attend to the words, that I say, to remove the errors of your mind.

4. He, the harbour of whose merits is bending down with the load of its fruits, feels a desire to hear these words for the sake of his salvation.

5. It is the noble minded only and not the base, that are receptacles of grand and holy sermons conferring the knowledge of their future state.

6. This collection consisting of thirty-two thousand stanzas, is deemed as containing the essence of the means conducing to liberation, and conferring the final annihilation (of our being).
7. As a lighted lamp presents its light to every waking man, so does this work effect the ultimate extinction of every person whether he would like it or not.
8. One's knowledge of this work whether by his own perusal or hearing of it from the rehearsal of others, tends to the immediate obliteration of his errors and augmentation of his delight, as it is done by the holy river of heaven (Ganges).
9. As the fallacy of a snake in the rope is removed by examining it, so the fallacy of the reality of the world is removed by perusal of this work, which gives peace to one who is vexed with and tired of the world.
10. It contains six books all fraught with sentences full of reason, and each distinct from the other in its import. It has many verses containing chosen examples on all subjects.
11. The first book treats of Indifference, and causes the growth of apathy (in the mind) like that of a tree in the desert soil.
12. It contains one thousand and five hundred stanzas, which being well considered in the mind, must impart a purity to it like the lustre of a gem after its polish.
13. The next book dwells on the conduct of one longing after his liberation, and contains a thousand slokas arranged in judicious order.
14. It describes the nature of men desiring their liberation. Then follows the book on the creation of the world, and filled with narratives and examples (of various kinds).
15. It has seven thousand stanzas teaching sound philosophy about the spectator and spectacle of the world in the forms of _I and thou_, designated the _ego_ and _non-ego_.
16. It contains a description of the production of the world from its state of non-existence. A diligent attention to this chapter will convey a full knowledge of this world into the mind of the hearer.
17. This _ego_ and _non-ego_, and this vast expanse with all the worlds, space and mountains, are (to be viewed) as having no form nor foundation, and as there are no such things (in reality).
18. There are no elements as the earth and others which exist in our fancy only, and are like phantoms appearing in a dream, or as aerial castles and chimeras of the mind.
20. They resemble the moving hills on the shore to one passing in a boat, without any actual movement in them; or liken the hobgoblins appearing to an unsound mind. Such is the appearance of the world without any seed or source or origin of its own.
21. It is as the impression of a tale in the mind, or the sight of a chain of pearls in the sky, or taking a bracelet for its gold or a wave for the water. (_i.e._ Taking the appearance for its _cause_, or the phenomena for the noumena).
22. Or as the blueness of the sky is always apparent to sight without its reality, and evercharming to behold without the existence of any colour in it.
23. Thus whatever unreal wonders always appear to us in our dreams or in the sky, they are but the resemblances of a fire in a picture, which 199037 seems to be burning without having any fire in it.

199038
199039 24. The word "jagat" or passing, is appropriately applied to the 199040 transitory world, which passes like the sea with its heaving waves, 199041 appearing as a chain of lotus flowers in dancing.

199042
199043 25. It is (as false) as one's imagination of a body of waters at a 199044 spot, from the sound of the ruddy geese (that live by rivers); and (as 199045 useless) as a withered forest in autumn, when the leaves and fruits 199046 fall off, and yield neither shade nor luscious nutriment, (to the 199047 traveller).

199048
199049 26. It is full with delirious cravings as of men at the point of death, 199050 and as dark as caverns in the mountains. Hence the efforts of men are 199051 but acts of their phrensy.

199053 27. It is better to dwell in the clear sky of the autumnal (atmosphere 199054 of) philosophy, after subsidence of the frost of ignorance, than to 199055 view at this world, which is no more than an image at a post or a 199056 picture upon the wall.

199058 28. Know all sensible and insensible things to be made of dust (to be 199059 reduced to dust again). Next follows the book on Existence.

199060
199061 29. It contains three thousand stanzas full of explanations and 199062 narratives, showing the existence of the world to be a form (or 199063 development) of the essence of the Ego (in a subjective light).

199064
199065 30. It treats of the manner in which the spectator (Ego) is manifest 199066 as the spectacle (non-ego), and how the ten-sided sphere of the 199067 arbour of the world is manifest both as the subjective and objective 199068 (at the same time).

199069
199070 31. It has thus arrived at its development which is said to be 199071 everlasting. Next follows the book on quietude consisting of five 199072 thousand stanzas.

199073
199074 32. The fifth is styled the book on holiness, containing a series of 199075 excellent lectures, and shewing the erroneous conception of the world, 199076 as I, thou and he (as distinct existences).

199077
199078 33. It is the suppression of this error, which forms the subject of 199079 this book; and the hearing of the chapter on quietude, serves to put an 199080 end to our transmigration in this world.

199081
199082 34. After suppression of the train of errors, there still remain slight 199083 vestiges of it to a hundredth part, as the dispersed troops in a 199084 picture afford us some faint idea of them.

199085
199086 35. Aiming at the object of another person is as vain as looking at 199087 the beauty of an imaginary city, and sitting in expectation of an 199088 unattainable object. It is as a noisy fighting for something in sleep.

199089
199090 36. It is as vain as a man of unsubdued desires, bursting into a 199091 roaring like that of the loud and tremendous thunder-claps, and as the 199092 raising of a city on the model of one's effaced impressions in a dream.

199094 37. It is as vain as a would-be city, with its garden and flowers and 199095 fruits growing in it: and as a sterile woman bragging of the valorous
199096 deeds of her unborn and would-be sons.

199097
199098 38. Or when a painter is about to draw the picture of an imaginary city
199099 on the ground work of a chart, by forgetting to sketch a plan of it 199100 beforehand.

199102 39. It is as vain as to expect evergreen herbage and fruitage of all
199103 seasons, and the breeze of an ungrown arbour; or to it in a future
199104 flowery parterre, pleasant with the sweets of spring.

199105

- 199106 40. Then follows the sixth book entitled annihilation, which is as 199107 clear as the waters of a river after subsidence of its billows within 199108 itself.
- 199109
- 199110 41. It contains the remaining number of slokas (_i.e._ 14500 Stanzas 199111 of the aggregate number of 32000 Slokas composing the entire work), 199112 a knowledge of these is pregnant with great meanings, and the 199113 understanding of them leads to the chief good of utter extinction and 199114 pacification of desires.
- 199115
- 199116 42. The intellect being abstracted from all its objects, presents the 199117 manifestation of the soul, which is full of intelligence and free from 199118 all impurity. It is enveloped in the sheath of infinite vacuity, and is 199119 wholly pure and devoid of worldly errors.
- 199120
- 199121 43. Having finished its journey through the world and performed its 199122 duties here, the soul assumes a calmness as that of the adamant
199123 column of the sky, reflecting the images of the tumultuous world 199124 (without changing itself).
- 199125
- 199126 44. It rejoices exceedingly at its being delivered from the innumerable 199127 snares of the world, and becomes as light as air by being freed from 199128 its desire of looking after the endless objects (of its enjoyments).
- 199129
- 199130 45. The soul that takes no notice of the cause or effect or doing of 199131 any thing, as also of what is to be avoided or accepted (i.e. which 199132 remains totally indifferent to every thing), is said to be disembodied
199133 though encumbered with a body, and to become unworldly in its worldly 199134 state.
- 199135
- 199136 46. The intelligent soul is compared to a solid rock, compact and 199137 without any gap in it. It is the sun of intelligence which enlightens 199138 all people, and dispels the darkness of ignorance.
- 199139
- 199140 47. (This soul) though so very luminous, has become grossly darkened 199141 (in its nature), by being confined to the vile fooleries of the world, 199142 and wasted by the malady of its cravings.
- 199143
- 199144 48. When freed from the chimera of its _egoism_, it becomes incorporeal 199145 even in its embodied state, and beholds (the glory of) the whole world 199146 as it was placed at the point of one of the myriads of hairs (on its 199147 body), or like a bee sitting on a flower upon the Sumeru mountain.
- 199148
- 199149 49. The intelligent and vacuous soul contains and beholds in its sphere 199150 a thousand glories of the world, shining in each atom, as it was in a 199151 mirror.
- 199152
- 199153 50. It is not even possible to thousands of Haris, Haras and Brahmás, 199154 to equal the great minded sage in the extent of his comprehensive soul;
199155 because the liberated have their chief good (of internal joy) stretched 199156 to a far greater limit than any.

199161 CHAPTER XVIII.

199162 ASCERTAINMENT OF THE EXAMPLE OR MAJOR PROPOSITION

199163

199164

199165

199166 Vasishtha said:—

199167

199168 The several parts of this work as already related, give rise to the 199169 understanding, as seeds sown in a good field never fail to produce good 199170 fruitage.

199171

199172 2. Even human compositions are acceptable when they are instructive 199173 of good sense; otherwise the Vedas also are to be renounced (as 199174 unreliable); because men are required always to abide by reason.

- 199175
199176 3. Words conformable with reason are to be received even if spoken by 199177 boys; otherwise they are to be rejected as straws though pronounced by 199178 the lotus-born (Brahmá himself).
199179
- 199180 4. Whoever drinks from a well by reason of its being dug by his 199181 ancestors, and rejects the holy water of the Ganges even when placed 199182 before him, is an incorrigible simpleton.
199183
- 199184 5. As early dawn is invariably accompanied by its train of light, so is 199185 good judgment an inevitable attendant on the perusal of this work.
199186
- 199187 6. Whether these lessons are heard from the mouth of the learned, or 199188 well studied by one's self, they will gradually make their impressions
199189 upon the mind by one's constant reflection on their sense.
199190
- 199191 7. They will first furnish (to the learner) a variety of Sanskrit
199192 expressions, and then spread before him a series of holy and judicious 199193 maxims, like so many ornamental creepers to decorate the hall.
199194
- 199195 8. They will produce a cleverness joined with such qualifications and 199196 greatness, as to engage the good grace of gods and kings.
199197
- 199198 9. They are called the intelligent who know the cause and effect of 199199 things, and are likened to a torch-bearer who is clear sighted in the 199200 darkness of the night. (Like the stoa of the Stoics).
199201
- 199202 10. All their erroneous and covetous thoughts become weaker by degrees, 199203 as the regions of the sky are cleared of their mists at the approach of 199204 autumn.
199205
- 199206 11. Your thoughts require only the guidance of reason (to hit the 199207 right), as every action needs be duly performed to make it successful.
199208
- 199209 12. The intellect becomes (by culture) as clear as a great lake in 199210 autumn, and it gets its calmness (by reason), like that of the sea
199211 after its churning by the Mandara mountain.
199212
- 199213 13. Like the flame of a chandelier cleansed of its sootiness and 199214 dispelling the shroud of darkness, the refined intellect shines forth
199215 in full brightness, and distinguishes (the different natures of) things.
199216
- 199217 14. The evils of penury and poverty cannot overpower on them, whose 199218 strong sight can discern the evils of their opposites (wealth and 199219 riches); as no dart can pierce the mortal parts of a soldier clad in 199220 full armour.
199221
- 199222 15. No worldly fears can daunt the heart of the wise man, however 199223 nearest they may approach to him. Just as no arrow can pierce through a 199224 huge solid stone.
199225
- 199226 16. Such doubts as "whether it is destiny or our own merit that is 199227 the cause of our births and actions," are removed (by learning), as 199228 darkness is dispelled by day-light.
199229
- 199230 17. There is a calm tranquility attending upon the wise at all times 199231 and in all conditions (of life); so also does the light of reason like 199232 solar rays, follow the dark night of error.
199233
- 199234 18. The man of right judgment has a soul as deep as the ocean and as 199235 firm as a mountain, and a cool serenity always shines within him like 199236 that of moon-light.
199237
- 199238 19. It is he who arrives slowly at what is called "living-liberation;"
199239 who remains calm amidst the endless turmoils (of the world), and is 199240 quite aloof from common talk (i.e. unnoticed by the world).
199241
- 199242 20. His mind is calm and cool at every thing; it is pure and full 199243 of heavenly light; shining serenely as the autumnal night with the radiance of moon-beams.

21. When the sun of reason illumines the cloudless region of the mind, no portentous comet of evil can make its appearance (within its sphere).

22. All desires are at rest with the elevated; they are pure with the steady, and indifferent to the inert, like the body of light clouds in autumn.

23. The slanders of envious ill-wishers are put out of countenance (by the wise), as the frolics of goblins disappear at the approach of day.

24. The mind that is fixed on the firm basis of virtue, and placed under the burthen of patience, is not to be shaken by accidents; but remains as a plant in a painting (unmoved by winds).

25. The knowing man does not fall into the pit-falls lying all about the affairs of this world: for who that knows the way will run into the ditch?

26. The minds of the wise are as much delighted in acting conformably to the precepts of good books and the examples of the virtuous, as chaste women are fond of keeping themselves within the bounds of the inner apartments.

27. Of the innumerable millions of atoms which compose this universe, every one of them is viewed in the light of a world in the mind of the abstracted philosopher.

28. The man whose mind is purified by a knowledge of the precepts of liberation, neither repines nor rejoices at the loss or gain of the objects of enjoyment.

29. Men of unfettered minds look upon the appearance and disappearance of every atomic world, as the fluctuating wave of the sea.

30. They neither grieve at unwished-for occurrences nor pine for their wished-for chances; and knowing well all accidents to be the consequences of their actions, they remain as unconscious as trees (totally insensible of them).

31. These (holy men) appear as common people, and live upon what they get; whether they meet with aught of welcome or unwelcome to them, their minds remain unconquered.

32. They having understood the whole of this Sástra, and having read and considered it well, as well as pondered (on its purport), hold their silence as in the case of a curse or blessing (which is never uttered by saints).

33. This Sástra is easy to be understood, and is ornamented with figures (of speech). It is a poem full of flavours and embellished with beautiful similes.

34. One may be self taught in it who has a slight knowledge of words and their senses; but he who does not understand the purport well, should learn it from a pandit.

35. After hearing, thinking and understanding this work, one has no more need of practising austerities, or of meditation and repeating the _Mantras_ and other rites: and a man requires nothing else in this world for the attainment of his liberation.

36. By deep study of this work and its repeated perusal, a man attains to an uncommon scholarship next to the purification of his soul.

37. The _ego_ and the _non-ego_, that is, the _viewer_ and the _view_, are both but chimeras of the imagination, and it is their annihilation alone, that leads insensibly to the vision of the soul.

199313
199314 38. The error of the reality of _ego_ and the perceptible world, will 199315 vanish away as visions in a dream; for who, that knows the falsehood of 199316 dreams, will fall into the error (of taking them for truth?)
199317

199318 39. As an imaginary palace gives no joy or grief to any body, so it is 199319 in the case of the erroneous conception of the world.
199320

199321 40. As no body is afraid of a serpent that he sees in painting, so the 199322 sight of a living serpent neither terrifies nor pleases one who knows 199323 it.
199324

199325 41. And as it is our knowledge of the painted serpent that removes our 199326 fear of it as a serpent, so our conviction of the unreality of the 199327 world, must disperse our mistake of its existence.
199328

199329 42. Even the plucking of a flower or tearing of its (tender) leaflet, 199330 is attended with a little exertion (of the nails and fingers), but no 199331 (bodily) exertion whatever is required to gain the blessed state (of 199332 Yoga meditation).
199333

199334 43. There is an action of the members of body, accompanied with the act
199335 of plucking or pulling off a flower; but in the other case (of Yoga), 199336 you have only to fix your mind, and make no exertion of your body.
199337

199338 44. It is practicable with ease by any one sitting on his easy seat 199339 and fed with his usual food, and not addicted to gross pleasures, nor 199340 trespassing the rules of good conduct.
199341

199342 45. You can derive happiness at each place and time, from your own 199343 observations, as also from your association with the good wherever it 199344 is available. This is an optional rule.
199345

199346 46. These are the means of gaining a knowledge of the highest wisdom, 199347 conferring peace in this world, and saving us from the pain of being 199348 reborn in the womb.
199349

199350 47. But such as are afraid of this course, and are addicted to the 199351 vicious pleasures of the world, are to be reckoned as too base, and no
199352 better than faeces and worms of their mother's bowels.
199353

199354 48. Attend now, Ráma, to what I am going to say with regard to the 199355 advancement of knowledge, and improvement of the understanding in 199356 another way.
199357

199358 49. Hear now the recent method in which this Sástra is learnt (by 199359 people), and its true sense interpreted to them by means of its 199360 Exposition.

199362 50. That thing which serves to explain the unapparent meaning (of a 199363 passage), by its illustration by some thing that is well known, and 199364 which may be useful to help the understanding (of the passage) is 199365 called a simile or Example.
199366

199367 51. It is hard to understand the meaning given before without an 199368 instance, just as it is useless to have a lampstick at home without 199369 setting a lamp on it at night.
199370

199371 52. Whatever similes and examples I have used to make you understand 199372 (the precepts), are all derived from some cause or other, but they lead
199373 to knowledge of the uncaused Brahma.
199374

199375 53. Wherever the comparisons and compared objects are used as 199376 expressive of the cause and effect, they apply to all cases except 199377 Brahma (who is without a cause).
199378

199379 54. The examples that are given to explain the nature of Brahma, are to 199380 be taken in their partial (and not general) sense.
199381

- 199382 55. Whatever examples are given here as explanatory of divine nature, 199383 they are to be understood as appertaining to a world seen in a dream.
199384
- 199385 56. In such cases, no corporeal instance can apply to the incorporeal 199386 Brahma, nor optional and ambiguous expressions give a definite idea of 199387 Him.
199388
- 199389 57. Those who find fault with instances of an imperfect or 199390 contradictory nature, cannot blame our comparison of the appearance of 199391 the world to a vision in dream.
199392
- 199393 58. A prior and posterior non-entity is considered as existent at the 199394 present moment (as is the visible world which was not, nor will be 199395 afterwards). So the waking and dreaming states are known to be alike 199396 from our boyhood.
199397
- 199398 59. The simile of the existence of the world with the dreaming state 199399 is exact in all instances, as our desires, thoughts, our pleasures and 199400 displeasures, and all other acts are alike in both states.
199401
- 199402 60. Both this work and others which have been composed by other authors 199403 on the means of salvation, have all pursued the same plan in their 199404 explanation of the knowable.
199405
- 199406 61. The resemblance of the world to a dream is found also in the 199407 Srutis or Vedānta. It is not to be explained in a word, but requires a 199408 continued course of lectures (on the subject).
199409
- 199410 62. The comparison of the world to an imagery in the dream or an 199411 imaginary Utopia of the mind, is also adduced in examples of this kind 199412 in preference to others.
199413
- 199414 63. Whenever a causality is shown by a simile of something which is no 199415 cause, there the simile is applied in some particular and not all its 199416 general attributes.
199417
- 199418 64. The partial similitude of this comparison with some property of the 199419 compared object, is unhesitatingly acknowledged by the learned in all 199420 their illustrations.
199421
- 199422 65. The light of the sense (of some thing) is compared with a lamp in 199423 its brightness only, in disregard of its stand or stick, the oil or the 199424 wick.
199425
- 199426 66. The compared object is to be understood in its capacity of 199427 admitting a partial comparison (of the properties); as in the instance 199428 of sense and light, the simile consists in the brightness of both.
199429
- 199430 67. When the knowledge of the knowable thing is derived from some 199431 particular property of the comparison, it is granted as a suitable 199432 simile, in understanding the sense of some great saying (passage in the 199433 scriptures).
199434
- 199435 68. We must not overshadow our intellect by bad logic, nor set at 199436 naught our common sense by an unholy scepticism.
199437
- 199438 69. We have by our reasoning well weighed the verbosity of our 199439 opinionative adversaries, and never set aside the holy sayings of the 199440 Vedas, even when they are at variance with the opinions of our families.
199441
- 199442 70. O Rāma! we have stored in our minds the truths resulting from the 199443 unanimous voice of all the Śāstras, whereby it will be evident that 199444 we have attained the object of our belief, apart from the fabricated
199445 systems of heretical Śāstras.
199446
199447
199448
199449
199450

ASCERTAINMENT OF TRUE EVIDENCE.

It is the similarity of some particular property (of one thing to that of another) which constitutes a simile; whereas a complete similitude between the comparison and compared object, destroys their difference (and makes them the one and same thing).

2. From the knowledge of parables follows the cognition of the one soul treated of in the Sástras (Vedánta); and the peace which attends on the meditation of the Holy Word, is styled Extinction.

3. It is therefore useless to talk of either (the complete or partial) agreement (of the properties) of the example and the exemplar; it is enough to the purpose to comprehend the purport of the holy word in some way or other.

4. Know your peace to be the chief good, and be diligent to secure the same. When you have got the food for your eating, it is useless to talk about how you came by it.

5. A cause is compared with (or shewn for its explication by) something which is no cause at all: so is a comparison given to express its partial agreement in some respect with the compared object.

6. We must not be so absorbed in the pleasures of the world as to be devoid of all sensibility; like some blind frogs which are generated and grow fat amidst the stones.

7. Be attentive to these parables and learn your best state from them; all reasonable men should abide by the lessons of religious works for their internal peace.

8. As also by the precepts of the Sástras, by the rules of humanity, prudence and spiritual knowledge; and also by the continued practice of the acts of religious merit.

9. Let the wise continue their inquiries until they can obtain their internal peace, and until they may arrive at the fourth stage (turya) of felicity known by the name of indestructible tranquility.

10. Whoso has gained this fourth state of tranquil felicity, he has really passed beyond the limits of the ocean of the world, whether he is alive or not, or a house-holder or an ascetic.

11. Such a man remains steady at his place like the calm sea undisturbed by the Mandara mountain, whether he has performed his duties according to the Srutis and Smritis or not.

12. When there is a partial agreement of the comparison with the nature of the compared object, it is to be considered maturely for the well understanding of the point in question, and not to be made a matter of controversy.

13. From every form of argument you are to understand the intelligible (that is explained to you); but the confounded disputant is blind both to right and false reasoning.

14. The notion of self (soul or God) being clear (self-evident) in the sphere of our consciousness within the mind. Any one who prattles meaninglessly about this truth, is said to be defective in his understanding (_i.e._ our consciousness of self-existence according to the maxim "_Ego sum qui cogito_," is an undeniable truth).

15. It is partly by pride and partly by their doubts, that the ignorant are led to altercation about their cognitions, and thereby they obscure the region of their inward understanding, as the clouds overshadow the clear firmament.

16. Of all sorts of proofs it is the evidence of perception which forms their fountain-head, as the sea is the mainspring of all its waters. It is this alone which is used in this place as you shall learn below.
17. The substance of all sensations is said to be the supersensible apprehension (or inward knowledge of things) by the wise; and it is verily their right concept which is meant by their perception.
18. Thus the notion, knowledge and certainty (of things) as derived from words, are styled the triplicate perception as we have of the living soul.
19. This soul is consciousness and egoism, and is of the masculine termination, and the cognition of the object whereby it is manifested to us, is called a category. (Viz. _samvid_, _samvitti_ and _padārtha_).
20. It becomes manifest in the form of the passing world by the multifarious acts and shifts of its volition and option, as the water exhibits itself in the shape of its waves and bubbles.
21. It was uncausal before, and then developed itself as the cause of all in its act of creating at the beginning of creation, and became perceptible by itself.
22. The causality was a product of the discrimination of the living soul, that was in a state of inexistence (before); until it became manifest as existent in the form of the material world.
23. Reason says, that the self-same being destroys the body which was produced of itself, and manifests itself in its transcendental magnitude (of intelligence).
24. When the reasoning man comes to know the soul, he finds by his reason the presence of the indescribable being, before him.
25. The mind being free from desire, the organs of sense are relieved from their action, the soul becomes devoid of the results of its past actions as of those it has left undone.
26. The mind being set at ease and freed from its desires, the organs of action are restrained from their acts, as an engine when stopped in its motion.
27. It is sensuousness which is reckoned as the cause that puts the machinery of the mind to work, just as the rope tied to the log and fastened about the neck of a ram, propels him to fighting.
28. The sight of external objects and the purposes of the internal mind, set all men at play, as the inward force of the air puts the winds to motion.
29. All spiritual knowledge is holy wherever it is found in any one: it adds a lustre to the body and mind like that of the expanded region of the sky.
30. He sees the appearances of all visible objects, and maintains his own position among them. He views the spirit in the same light in which it presents itself in any place.
31. Wherever the universal soul appears itself in any light, it remains there and then in the same form in which it exhibits itself unto us.
32. The universal soul being alike in all, the looker and the object seen are both the same being. The looker and the looked being one, their appearance as otherwise is all unreal.
33. Hence the world is without a cause (because it is an unreality and not caused by any one). All existence is evidently Brahma himself, the perceptible cause of all. Hence perception (pratyaxa) is the basis of evidence, and inference and others as analogy and verbal testimony are but parts of it (anumāna, upamā, sābdah).

34. Now let the worshippers of fate who apply the term destiny to all their exertions, cast off their false faith; and let the brave exert their manliness to attain their highest state.

35. Continue O Rāma, to consider the true and lucid doctrines of the successive teachers (of mankind), until you can arrive to a clear conception of the infinitely Supreme being in your own mind.

CHAPTER XX.

ON GOOD CONDUCT.

It is the society of the respectable and reasoning with them, that leads most efficiently to the improvement of the understanding, and next to the making of a great man, with all the characteristics of greatness.

2. Whatever man excels in any quality here, he becomes distinguished by it: therefore learn it from him, and improve your understanding by the same.

3. True greatness consists in quietness and other virtues, without a knowledge of which it is impossible, O Rāma! to be successful in anything.

4. Learning produces quiet and other qualities, and increases the virtues of good people; all which are praised by their good effects on the mind, as the rain is hailed for its growing the new sprouts of plants.

5. The qualities of quietude and other virtues serve to increase the best knowledge (of men); as sacrifice with rice serves to produce felicitous rains for the harvest.

6. As learning produces the qualities of quiet and the like, so do these qualities give rise to learning; thus they serve to grow each other, as the lake and lotuses contribute to their mutual benefit (excellence).

7. Learning is produced by right conduct as good conduct results from learning; thus wisdom and morality are natural helps to one another.

8. The intelligent man who is possessed of quietude, meekness and good conduct, should practise wisdom, and follow the ways of good people.

9. Unless one should bring to practice his wisdom and good conduct in an equal degree, he will never be successful in either of them.

10. Both of these should be conjoined together like the song united with percussion, as it is done by the husbandman and his wife in sowing the seeds and driving away the (seed-picking) birds from their fields of grain.

11. It is by practice of wisdom and right conduct (as causes of one another), that good people are enabled to acquire both of them in an equal degree.

12. I have already expounded to you, O Rāma, the rule of good conduct, and will now explain to you fully the way of gaining learning.

13. Learning conduces to renown, long life and to the acquisition of the object of your exertion; therefore should the intelligent learn the good sciences from those who have studied and mastered them.

14. By hearing (these lectures) with a clear understanding, you will surely attain the state of perfection, as dirty water is purified by infusion of the _Kata_ fruits.

15. The sage who has known the knowable, has his mind drawn insensibly to the blissful state; and that highest state of unbounded felicity being once known and felt (in the mind), it is hard to loose its impression at any time.

YOGA VÁSISHTHA

BOOK III.

UTPATTI-KHANDA.

EVOLUTION OF THE WORLD.

CHAPTER I.

CAUSES OF BONDAGE TO IT.

SECTION I.

EXORDIUM (BHÚMIKÁ.)

It is both by means of words and lights (_Vágbhábhish_ _i.e._ the words of the scripture and the lights of nature and reason), that the knower of the Great God (Brahmavid), perceives the spirit of Brahma appearing within himself as in a dream. And he also knows him as such, who understands him according to the purport of the holy text. "What this is, that is the self." (_i.e._ He is all in all).

2. This passage shows in short, the visible world to reside in the vacuous bosom of Brahma at its creation: it is now to be known in length, what this creation is, whence it takes its rise, and wherein it becomes extinct at last.

3. Hear me, O intelligent Ráma! now expound to you all things according to my best knowledge of them, and agreeably to their nature and substance in the order of creation.

4. One conscious of himself as a spiritual and intelligent being, views the passing world as a _Somnum_ (swapnam) dream: and this dreaming simile of the passing world, applies equally to our knowledge of _ego_ and _tu_ or _non-ego_ (which is as false as our cognitions in a dream).

5. Next to the book describing the conduct of the seekers of liberation (_mumukshu-vyavahára_), then follows the book of evolution (_utpatti_), which I am now going to propound to you.

SECTION II.

WORLDLY BONDAGE.

6. Bondage consists in our belief of the reality of the visible world (and our relation with its phenomena, Gloss). So our release depends on the negation of phenomenals. Now hear me tell you how to get rid of the visible (fetters of our minds).

- 199727
199728 7. Whoever is born in this world, continues to progress, till at 199729 last he obtains his final liberation (his ultimum and optimum 199730 perfection); or rises towards heaven or falls into hell (under the 199731 subjection of his righteous and unrighteous actions (Gloss)).
199732
199733 8. I shall therefore expound for your understanding every thing
199734 relating to the production and continuance of things, and their prior 199735 states as they were.
199736
199737 9. Hear me Ráma, now give you an abstract of this book in brief, and I 199738 will here-after dilate upon it, as you may wish to know more of this 199739 (theory of production).
199740
199741

199742 SECTION III.

199743 PHASES OF THE SPIRIT.

- 199744
199745
199746 10. Whatever appears either as moving or unmoving in this world,
199747 know them all as appearances in a dream in a state of sound sleep 199748 (susupti); which become extinct at the end of a Kalpa-age. (The 199749 events of a Kalpa or day of Brahmá are as his day dream).
199750
199751 11. Then there remains a nameless and undeveloped something, in a 199752 state of deep, dark and dank abyss, without any light or thick-spread 199753 (nebulae) over it. (The Teo and Beo of Moses, the tama = teom of Manu 199754 and Veda, and the Moisture of Thales).
199755
199756 12. This great self-existence is afterwards attributed with the 199757 titles of Reality (Rita), self (Ātma), Supreme (Param), Immense
199758 (Brahma), Truth (Satyam) and so forth by the wise, as expressions 199759 for the Great Spirit (mahātman) for popular use. (Vide Gloss for 199760 definitions of these terms).
199761
199762 13. This self-same spirit next shows itself in another form, which 199763 is called the living soul (Jīvātmá), and comes afterwards to be 199764 understood in the limited sense of life. (Jíva, Jív, Zeu or Zeus; Ji 199765 and Ján; Zoa Protozoa &c.). (But it is the undivided and universal soul 199766 of which the divided, individual and particular souls are but parts and 199767 particles. Gloss).
199768
199769 14. This inert living principle (Jíva-Life or the Protozoa), becomes 199770 according to its literal signification the moving spirit (ákulátma), 199771 which afterwards with its power of thinking (manana) becomes the 199772 Mind, and lastly the embodied soul (Bhútātmá). (So says the Sruti;
199773 Ētasmát Jáyate pránah, manah, sarvendriyánicha, Kham,
199774 Váyurúp, Prithiví &c.) (i.e. From Him—the Spirit, is derived 199775 the life, mind and the organs of sense or body, whence he is styled the 199776 Living, Thinking and All acting Deity)).
199777
199778 15. Thus the mind is produced and changed from the quiescent nature of 199779 the Great Supreme Spirit to a state of restlessness (asthirákára) 199780 like that of a surge, heaving itself in the (Pacific) Ocean (i.e.
199781 the restful spirit of God-Brahma is transformed to the restless state
199782 of the Mind, personified as Brahmá or Hiranyagarbha, called the 199783 Atmabhu—the son of the spirit of God or God the Son, Demiurge).
199784
199785 16. The mind soon evolves itself as a self-volitive power which 199786 exercises its desires at all times whereby this extensive magic 199787 scene of the world is displayed to our view. This scene is figured 199788 as Virájmúrti, or manifestation of the desires of the will of 199789 Divine mind, and represented as the offspring of Brahmá in the Indian 199790 Theogony. (Vide Manu on Genesis, chap I).
199791
199792 17. As the word golden bracelet signifies no other thing than a 199793 bracelet made of gold, so the meaning of the word world is not 199794 different from its source—the Divine will. (The difference is formal 199795 and not material, and consists in form and not in the substance, the divine will being the substratum of the formal world).

18. Again as the word gold bears the idea of the substance of which the bracelet is made, so the word Brahma conveys the meaning of immensity which contains the world in it; but the word world contains no idea of Brahma nor bracelet that of gold. (The substance contains the form as a stone does the statue, but the form does not contain the substance, as the statue may be of earth or metal or of wood).

19. The unreality of the world appears as a reality, just as the heat of the sun presents the unreal mirage in the moving sands of the desert as real waves of the sea. (So the phantasm of the mind-Brahmá, presents the phantasmagoria of the world (Viswarúpa) as a sober reality).

20. It is this phantasy (of the reality of the unreal world), which the learned in all things, designate as ignorance-avidyá, nature-sansriti, bondage-bandha, illusion-máyá, error-moha, and darkness-tamas. (To denote our mental delusion and deception of senses. Gloss).

SECTION IV.

NATURE OF BONDAGE.

21. Now hear me relate to you, O moon-faced Ráma! about the nature of this bondage, whereby you will be able to know the mode and manner of our liberation from it (as the diagnosis of a disease being known, it is not difficult to heal it).

22. The intimate relation of the spectator with the spectacle is called his bondage to the same, because the looker's mind is fast bound to the object of his sight. It is the absence of the visible objects, therefore, from the mirror of the mind, which is the only means of his liberation. (So also is the removal of the objects of the other senses from the mind).

23. The knowledge of the world, ego and tu (as separate existences) is said to be an erroneous view of the soul (which is one and the same in all); and there can be no liberation of one, as long as he labours under this blunder of bheda-jnána or knowledge of individualities. (This is called savikalpa-jnána or cognition of biplicity, which cannot lead to Kaivalya mukti or the felicity derived from a knowledge of universal unity).

24. To say that the soul is neither this nor that (nedam-nedam) is but false logomachy, which cannot come to an end. The discrimination of alternatives serves only to increase the ardour for the visibles. (i.e. The ardour of induction spreads the infection of materialism. The idle neti-neti and tanna-tanna of Vedanta Philosophy is mere amphilogy and prevarication of both, as idem et non idem).

25. It is not to be obtained by sophists by the chopping of logic or by pilgrimage or ceremonial acts, any more than by a belief in the reality of the phenomenal world. (All these are observances of the esoteric faith and blind persuasion, but do not appertain to the science of esoteric spiritualism. Gloss).

26. It is hard to avoid the sight of the phenomenal world, and to repress one's ardour for the same. But it is certain that, the visibles can not lead us to the Reality, nor the Real mislead us to unreality (i.e. the spiritual and physical knowledge are mutually repugnant to each other).

27. Wherever the invisible, inconceivable and intelligent spirit is existent, there the beholder views the visible beauty of God shining even in the midst of atoms. (i.e. Every particle of matter manifests the beauty of its maker; unless there be a dull material object to intercept the sight of the intelligent soul).

199866 28. The phenomenal world has its rise from Him, yet those ignorant
199867 people that depart from Him to the adoration of others, resemble fools, 199868 that forsake rice to feed upon gruel. (_i.e._ They take the shadow for 199869 the substance).

199870
199871 29. Although this visible world is apparent to sight, yet O Ráma! it
199872 is but a shadow of that Being, who resides alike in the smallest atom 199873 as in the mirror of the mind, that receives the image of the largest 199874 as well as minutest things. (Compare. As full and perfect in a hair as 199875 heart. Pope.)

199877 30. The spirit is reflected in every thing like a figure in the mirror, 199878 and it shines equally in rocks and seas, in the land and water, as it 199879 does in the mirror of the mind. (compare: Wherever I cast my eyes, thy 199880 beauty shines).

199882 31. The visible world is the scene of incessant woes, births, decay 199883 and death, and the states of waking, dreaming and sound sleep, are 199884 presenting by turns the gross, subtle and evanescent forms of things
199885 for our delusion.

199887 32. Here I sit in my meditative mood (_anirúdha_), having wiped off 199888 the impressions of the visibles from my mind; but my meditation is 199889 disturbed by the recurrence of my remembrance of the visibles: and this 199890 is the cause of the endless transmigrations of the soul. (_i.e._ The 199891 reminiscence of the past is the cause of our everlasting bondage in 199892 life).

199893
199894 33. It is hard to have a fixed (_nirúdha_) and unalterable
199895 (_nirvikalpa_) meditation (_samádhi_), when the sight of the visible
199896 world is present before our bodily and mental vision. Even the fourth 199897 stage of insensible _samádhi_ called the turiya, in the state of sound 199898 sleep (_susupti_), is soon succeeded by one's self-consciousness and 199899 external intelligence.

199900
199901 34. On rising from this state of deep meditation, one finds himself as 199902 roused from his sound sleep, in order to view the world full of all its 199903 woes and imperfections opening wide before him. (Compare, "I wake to a 199904 sea of troubles, how happy they who wake no more". Young).

199905
199906 35. What then, O Ráma! is the good of this transient bliss which one
199907 attains by his temporary abstraction (Dhyána), when he has to fall 199908 again to his sense of the sufferings to which the world is subject as a 199909 vale of tears. (Compare, "When the cock crew I wept &c." Young's Night 199910 Thoughts).

199911
199912 36. But if one can attain to a state of unalterable abstraction of his 199913 thoughts from all worldly objects, as he has in his state of sound 199914 sleep (_susupti_), he is then said to have reached the highest pitch of 199915 his holiness on earth. (For it is the entire oblivion of the world that 199916 is necessary for our spiritual perfection, as it is said, "forget the 199917 present for the future").

199918
199919 37. No body has ever earned aught of reality in the scene of unreal
199920 vanities; for whenever his thoughts come in contact with any outward 199921 thing, he finds it inseparable from the blemishes of existence.
199922 ("Vanity of vanities, the world is vanity". Ecclesiastes.)

199923
199924 38. Should any body (in the practice of the fixedness of his 199925 attention), fix his sight for a while on a stone, by forcibly
199926 withdrawing it from visible objects, he is sure to be carried away 199927 afterwards by the visibles pressing upon his sight.

199928
199929 39. It is well known to all that an unflinching meditation, having even 199930 the firmness of a rock, can have no durability, in the practice of the 199931 Yogi owing to his worldly propensities.

199932
199933 40. Even the _nirúdha_ or steadfast meditation which has attained the fixedness of a rock, cannot advance one step towards the attainment of that tranquillity which has no bounds to it. (_i.e._ The everlasting bliss of liberation or _moksha_).

41. Thus the sight of phenomena being altogether irrepressible, it is a foolish supposition of its being suppressed by practices of _Jap-tap_ or prayers and austerities and the like acts of devotion.

42. The idea of the phenomena (_drisyadhi_), is as inherent in the mind of the spectator of the visible world, as the seeds of the lotus flower are contained in the inner cells of the pericarp.

43. The ideal of the phenomenal world (_drisyadhi_), lies as hidden in the minds of the spectators of the outer world, as are the in-born flavour and moisture of fruits, the oil of sesamum seeds; and the innate sweet scent of flowers.

44. As the fragrance of camphor and other odoriferous substances inheres in their nature, so the reflexion of the visible world resides in the bosom of the intellect.

45. As your dreams and desires rise and subside of themselves under the province of your intellect, so the notions of things always recur to your mind from the original ideas of them impressed in the seat of the visibles (the mind).

46. The mental apparition of the visible world, deludes its beholder in the same manner, as the visual appearance of a spectre or hobgoblin, misleads a child (to its destruction).

47. The notion of the visible world gradually expands itself, as the germ of the seed shoots forth in time, and spreads itself afterwards in the form of a plant.

48. As the minute germs and animalcules, which are contained within the bosoms of fruits and embryos of animals, expand themselves to wonderfully beauteous forms afterwards, so the seed of this world (originally) lying hid in the Divine Mind, unfolds itself in wonderful forms of the visible phenomena in nature.

CHAPTER II.

DESCRIPTION OF THE FIRST CAUSE.

SECTION I.

NARRATIVE OF THE AIR-BORN AND AERIFORM BRÁHMAN.

Vasishtha resumed:—Hear me Ráma; now relate to you the narrative of one Ákásaja or air-born Bráhman, which will be a jewel to your ears, and enable you the better to understand the drift of the book of Genesis.

2. There lived a Bráhman Ákásaja by name, who sat always reclined in his meditation, and was ever inclined to the doing of good to all creatures.

3. Finding him long-lived, Death thought within himself saying:—It is I alone that am imperishable, and devour all things one by one.

4. How is it that I cannot cram myself with this air-born, wherein I find my teeth as blunt in him, as the edge of a sword is put to the bluff by the solid rock.

5. So saying, he proceeded to the abode of the Bráhman, intent upon

200003 making an end of him; for who is of so dull a nature as is not alert in 200004 his practice.

200006 6. But as he was about to enter the house, he was opposed by a gorgeous 200007 flame of fire, like the conflagration of final destruction on the last 200008 day of the dissolution of the world.

200009
200010 7. He pierced the ambient flame and entered the dwelling, where seeing 200011 the Bráhmaṇ before him, he stretched his hand to lay hold on him with 200012 all avidity.

200013
200014 8. He was unable even with his hundred hands (i.e. with all his 200015 might) to grasp the Bráhmaṇ, as it is impossible for the strongest to 200016 withstand the resolute man in his wonted course.

200017
200018 9. He then had recourse to Yama—his lord to clear his doubt, and to 200019 learn why he could not devour the air-born (being).

200020
200021 10. Yama replied saying:—Death, trust not too far thy own might, that 200022 makes thee mighty to destroy the living. It is the act of the dying 200023 person that is the chief cause of his death and naught otherwise.

200025 11. Therefore do thou be diligent to find out the acts of the person 200026 thou intendest to kill; because it is by their assistance only that 200027 thou canst seize thy prey.

200028
200029 12. Hereupon Death betook himself gladly to wander about in all 200030 places under the horizon. He roved over the habitable parts, as also 200031 throughout the lacunal and fluvial districts.

200032
200033 13. He traversed the forests and jungles, marshy and rocky grounds and 200034 maritime coasts, and passed to foreign lands and islands, and pried
200035 through their wildernesses, cities and towns.

200037 14. He searched through kingdoms and countries, villages and deserts;
200038 and surveyed the whole earth to find out some act of the Bráhmaṇ in any 200039 part of it.

200041 15. At last Death with all his search and effort, came to find the acts
200042 of the air-born Bráhmaṇ, to be as nil as the offspring of a barren 200043 woman; and his mind as transfixed (in meditation) as if it were a rock.

200044
200045 16. He then returned from his reconnoitering to his all-knowing master 200046 Yama, and besought his advice, as servants do in matters of doubt and 200047 difficulty (how to proceed).

200049 17. Death addressed him saying:—"Tell me my lord, where the acts of 200050 the Air-born Bráhmaṇ are to be found;" to which Yama after a long 200051 head-work, replied as follows.

200052 200053 SECTION II.

200054 200055 STATE OF THE SOUL.

200056
200057 18. Know, O Death! that this air-born seer has no acts whatever; for as 200058 he is born of empty air so his doings are all null and void. (i.e.
200059 The bodiless spirit or mind is devoid of acts requiring physical means 200060 and appliances).

200062 19. Whoso is born of air, is as pure as air itself, and has no
200063 combination of cause or acts like all embodied (beings).

200064
200065 20. He has no relation with acts of his prior existence. He is nil 200066 as the child of an unprolific woman, and as one unborn, uncreated and 200067 unbegotten.

200069 21. Want of causes has made him a pure vacuous being, and the privation
200070 of prior acts has made him as nil as an etherial arbor.

22. His mind is not ruffled as those of others, by reason of the privation of his former acts; nor is there any such act of his present state, whereby he may become a morsel to death.

23. Such is the soul seated in the sheath of vacuity, and remaining for ever as the simple form of its own causality (káranadeha), and not guided by any extraneous causation whatever.

24. It has no prior deed, nor does it do any thing at present; (i.e. neither led by predestination, nor actuated by present efforts); but continues as something in the shape of aeriform intelligence.

25. Our inference of the actions of breathing and motion by the agency of the soul, is a mere supposition; because the soul is devoid of every thought of or tendency to action.

26. It sits meditating on itself as inseparable from the Supreme Intelligence, just as the images (in painting and statuary), are inseparable from the mind of the painter and sculptor.

27. The self-born Bráhma is as intimately connected with the objects of his thought, as fluidity is associated with water and vacuity with the firmament.

28. His soul is as immanent in the supreme, as motion is inherent in the winds. It has neither the accumulated acts of past lives, nor those of its present state. (i.e. It is neither a passive nor active agent of prior or present acts; but is an indifferent witness of the acts of the body and mind).

29. It is produced without the co-operation of accompanying causes, and being free from prior motives, it is not subjected to the vicissitudes concomitant with human life.

30. It is found to be no other than its own cause; and having no other cause for itself, it is said to be self-produced.

31. Say, how can you lay hold on that being that has done no act before, nor is in the act of doing any thing at present? It is then only subjected to thee when it thinks itself mortal. (But he that knows his soul to be immortal is not subject to death).

32. Whoso believes his soul to be of this earth, and thinks himself to be an earthly being, he may be easily overtaken by thee (whose power extends over earth-born mortals only).

33. This Bráhma is a formless being, by reason of his disowning the material body. Hence it is as hard for thee to enthrall him, as to entwine the air with a rope.

34. Death rejoined saying:—Tell me my lord! how may the unborn Aja or the self-born swayambhu, be produced out of vacuum, and how can an earthly or other elemental body be and not be (at the same time).

35. Yama replied:—This Bráhma is neither born nor is nil at any time; but remains for ever the same, as the light of intelligence of which there is no decay.

36. There remains nothing at the event of the great Doomsday, except the tranquil, imperishable and infinite Bráhma himself in his spiritual form.

37. This is the nature of the everlasting vacuum, too subtile in its essence, and devoid of all attributes; but viewing present before its mind, the stupendous cosmos in the form of a huge mountain in the beginning of recreation. (The mind is the noumenon—Brahma, and the phenomena of the world is the gigantic macrocosm known as Virájmúrti).

38. Being of the nature of intelligence it is imperishable; but those who view the spirit in the form of any phenomenal body, are liable to perish with it like all embodied beings.

39. Thus this Bráhma remained in the womb of vacuity in the beginning, in his state of unalterable, vacuous intelligence.

40. It is purely of the nature of the inane understanding, and of the form of a vast expanse of omniscience; having neither body nor organism; no acts nor agency, nor desire of any kind in itself.

41. That which is simply of the form of vacuum and pure light, is never beset by the snare of pristine desires, as a corporeal being.

42. It has nothing to know or see without itself (_i.e._ beyond its self-consciousness). The only conception that we have of it, is what resembles an extended intelligence (_i.e._ an all-diffusive omniscience).

43. Under these circumstances, how is it susceptible of any earthly or other external form? Therefore O Death! desist from thy attempt to lay hold on the same.

44. Hearing these words of Yama, Death thought upon the impracticability of laying hold on empty vacuity by any body, and sorrowfully returned to his own abode.

45. Ráma said: you said sir, that Brahmá is your great grand-sire; I think it is he that you mean to say as the unborn, self-born, universal soul and intelligence.

46. So is this Brahmá, Ráma! as I have spoken to you, and it was with regard to the same, that the aforesaid discussion was held of yore between Death and Yama (Pluto).

47. Again when Death had made an end of all living beings at the interval of a _manwantará_, he thought himself strong enough to make an attempt to bear down upon the lotus-born Brahmá also.

48. It was then that he was admonished by Yama, saying:—It is your habit that makes you go on your wonted course of killing.

49. But the super-etherial form of Brahmá too is beyond your reach: it being simply of the nature of the mind having connection with its thoughts only, and no concern with the actual forms of things.

50. It is of the form of the wonderfully vacuous intellect, having the faculty of cognition in it. Thus the intellect being but vacuum, has neither any cause for it, nor any effect produced by it.

51. As the aeriform volitive principle in men, manifests itself without being connected with material forms, so is the self-born (Brahmá) manifest to all in his own immaterial nature.

52. Like strings of pearl appearing to view in the clear firmament, and forms of cities seen in a dream, the self-born (Brahmá) is manifest of himself without relation to external objects.

53. As there is no beholder nor any thing beholden of the solitary Supreme spirit which is the intellect itself; so is the mind manifest of itself (without its looking at or being looked upon by any body).

54. It is the volitive mind which is called Brahmá and volition being a spiritual faculty, has no connection with any material substance.

55. As the mind of the painter is fraught with images of various things, so is the mind of Brahmá full of figures of all created beings.

56. The self-born Brahmá is manifest in his own mind as Brahmá is manifested in the vacuous sphere of his intellect. He is without beginning, middle and end, and appears to have a figure like that of a male being, while in reality he has no body, as the offspring of a barren woman.

CHAPTER III.

CAUSES OF BONDAGE IN THE BODY.

Ráma said:—It is even so as you have said, that the mind is a pure essence, and has no connection with the earth and other material substances; and that it is verily Brahmá itself.

2. Now tell me, O Bráhma! Why the remembrance of his former states (in the past and previous Kalpas), is not (to be reckoned as) the cause of his birth, as it is in the case of mine and yours and of all other beings.

3. Vasishtha replied:—Whoever had a former body, accompanied with the acts of his prior existence, retains of course its reminiscence, which is the cause of his being (reborn on earth).

4. But when Brahmá is known to have no prior acts, how is it possible for him to have his reminiscence of any thing?

5. Therefore he exists without any other cause except the causation of his own mind. It is by his own causality that the Divine spirit is self-born, and is himself his own spirit.

6. He is everlasting, and his body is born of itself from the self-existent Brahma. This unborn or self-born Brahmá has no material body whatever, except his subtile átiváhika or linga deha.

7. Ráma said:—The everlasting body is one thing (called the Súkshma saríra or subtile or immaterial body), and the mortal body is another (called the sthúladeha or the gross and material frame). Now tell me sir, whether all created beings have a subtile body also as that of Brahmá?

8. Vasishtha replied:—All created beings that are produced of a cause, have two bodies (the súkshma and the sthúla or the subtile and the gross). But the unborn being which is without a cause, has one body only (which is called the átiváhika or the everlasting spiritual body).

9. The increate Brahmá is the cause of all created beings, but the uncreated spirit having no cause for itself, has one body for it.

10. The prime lord of creatures has no material body; but manifests himself in the vacuous form of his spiritual body.

11. His body is composed of the mind alone, and has no connection with the earth or any other material substance. He is the first lord of creatures, that stretched the creation from his vacuous body (or spiritual essence).

12. All these are but forms of the images or ideas in his vacuous mind, and having no other patterns or originals in their nature. And that every thing is of the same nature with its cause, is a truth well known to all (from the identity of the effect and its material cause).

13. He is an inexistent being and of the manner of perfect intelligence. He is purely of the form of the mind, and has an intellectual and no material entity.

14. He is prime (cause) of all material productions in the physical world, and is born of himself with his prime mobile force in the form of the mind.

15. It was by the first impulse given by the prime moving power, that this expanse of creation came to be spread in the same ratio, as the currents of air and water (or the velocity of winds and tides), are in proportion to the impetus given to them.

16. This creation shining so bright to our sight, has caught its light from the luminous mind of the formless Brahmá, and appears as real to our conceptions (as they are ideal in the Divine mind).

17. Our vision in a dream is the best illustration of this (unreality of worldly things): as that of the enjoyment of connubial bliss in dreaming. It is then that an unreal object of desire, presents itself as an actual gain to our fond and false imagination.

18. The vacuous, immaterial and formless spirit, is now represented as the self-born and corporeal lord of creatures in the form of the first male. (Protogonus or the only begotten son of God).

19. He remains undiscerned in his state of pure intelligence; but becomes manifest to all by the evolution of his volition. He is indiscernible in his absolute state (of inaction); but becomes conspicuous to us in the display of his nature (in creation).

20. Brahmá is the divine power of volition (or the will of God). He is personified as the first male agent of creation, but devoid of a corporeal body. He is only of the spiritual form of the mind, and the sole cause of the existence of the triple world.

21. It is his volition that makes the self-born (Brahmá) to exert his energies, as human desires impel all mankind to action: and the vacuous mind manifests itself as a mountain of desires.

22. It then forgets its everlasting and incorporeal nature, and assumes to itself the solid material body, and shows itself in the shape of a delusive apparition (in his creation).

23. But Brahmá, who is of an unsullied understanding, is not involved in oblivion of himself, by the transformation of his unknowable nature to the known state of volition (or change of the _nirguna_ to _saguna_).

24. Being unborn of material substance, he sees no apparition like others, who are exposed by their ignorance to the misleading errors of falsehood, appearing in the shape of a mirage before them.

25. As Brahmá is merely of the form of the mind, and not composed of any material substance, so the world being the product of the eternal mind, is of the same nature with its original archetype.

26. Again as the uncreated Brahmá is without any accompanying causality with himself, so his creation has no other cause beside himself (_i.e._ There is no secondary cause of the universe).

27. Hence there is no difference in the product from its producer; because it is certain, that the work must be as perfect as its author (so says the _Sruti_:-_Púrnat púrnám_ &c.).

28. But there is nothing as a cause and effect to be found in this creation, because the three worlds are but the prototypes of the archetype of the divine mind.

29. The world is stretched out in the model of the Divine mind, and not formed by any other holy spirit. It is as immanent in the mind of God, as fluidity is inherent in water.

30. It is the mind which spreads out this extended unreality of the world like castles in the air, and builds Utopian cities (by its imagination only).

31. There is no such thing as materiality, which is as false a conception as that of a snake in a rope. Hence it is no way possible for Brahma and other beings to exist as individual bodies.

32. Even spiritual bodies are inexistent to enlightened understandings. As for the material body, it has no room in existence. (Matter or a corporeal substance or an unseen substratum is a non-entity. Berkeley).

33. Man (manu) who derives his name from his mind (mana) is a form of the volitive soul called Verinchi (Lat. vir-inchoare the inchoative spirit of Brahma); and has for his dominion the mental or intellectual world mano-rajyam (Lat. mentis regio vel regnum) where all things are situated in the form of realities.

34. The mind is the creative Brahma called Verinchitvas (Lat. Virinchoativus), by the exercise of its inherent sankalpa or the volition of incipience or creation-sisriksha; and displays itself in the form of the visible universe by development of its own essence.

35. This Virinchi or the creative power is of the form of the mind manas, as the mind itself is of the form of Virinchi also. It has no connection with any material substance, which is a mere creation of the imagination. (That is to say, matter is an imaginary substance or substratum of qualities only).

36. All visible things are contained in the bosom of the mind, as the lotus-bud and blossom reside in the seed of the lotus. Hence there is no difference between the mental and visible appearances of things, nor has any one ever doubted of it any where.

37. Whatever things you see in a dream, whatever desires you have at heart and all the ideals of your fancy, together with your ideas, notions and impressions of the visibles, know your mind to be the receptacle of them all.

38. But the visible objects relating to the option of the mind (i.e. which are desirable, to every one), are as baneful to their beholder, as an apparition is to a child (i.e. they are equally tempting and misleading to all).

39. The ideal of the phenomenal drisyadhi, developes itself as the germ contained in the seed and becomes in its proper time and place a large tree (comparable with the great arbor of the world known as sansáramahí ruha or Vriksha).

40. If there is no rest with what is real, there can be no peace with the phenomenals which are full of troubles, and give no solace to the mind. It is impossible that the feeling of the perception of visibles will be ever lost to their perceiver (observer), though its subsidence only is said to constitute liberation.

CHAPTER IV.

SECTION I.

DESCRIPTION OF THE NIGHT-FALL.

Válmíki related:—

While Vasistha—the leading sage, was thus going on with his lecture without interruption, the whole assembly was intent upon listening to it with a fixed tone and tenor of their minds.

- 200417
200418 2. The string of bells (tied to the waists of warriors) ceased to 200419 jingle, every one was motionless, and even the parrots in the cages
200420 ceased to warble and flutter.
200421
200422 3. The ladies forgot their dalliance and were quietly attentive to the 200423 sermon: and all in the royal hall, were fixed in attention as they were 200424 paintings and statues.
200425
200426 4. There remained but an hour to the closing of the day, and the 200427 sun-beams became agreeable to all. The busy bustle of the world was 200428 dwindling away with the glimmering light of the setting sun.
200429
200430 5. The beds of full-blown lotuses exhaled their fragrance all around, 200431 and soft Zephyrs were playing about, as if to attend the audience.
200432
200433 6. The sun glided away from his diurnal course, and advanced to the top 200434 of his solitary setting mountain, as if he meant to reflect on all that 200435 he had heard.
200436
200437 7. The shades of night began to cover the landscape, and the frost to 200438 overspread the forest-lands; as if they were cooled by the cooling 200439 lectures on philosophy.
200440
200441 8. Now failed the concourse of the people in all directions, as if they 200442 had availed themselves of the instructions of the sage to abate the 200443 fervour of their exertions.
200444
200445 9. All objects on earth cast their lengthened shadows, as if they 200446 stretched their necks to hear the preaching of Vasishtha.
200447
200448 10. The chamberlain then advanced lowly to the monarch of the earth,
200449 and begged to inform, that the time for evening ablution and service,
200450 was about to expire.
200451
200452 11. Upon this the sage Vasishtha, curbed his sweet speech and 200453 said:—Let thus far, mighty king! be your hearing of this day, and I 200454 will resume my lecture, and speak of other things to-morrow.
200455
200456 12. Here the sage held his silence, when the king responded "Be it so 200457 as you will," and rose from his seat.
200458
200459 13. He honoured for his own good, that godly sage and the other seers
200460 and Bráhmans, with due respects and offerings of flowers, water, worthy 200461 honorariums, fees, gifts and homage.
200462
200463 14. Then rose the whole assembly with the king and the assemblage of 200464 sages; and the gems and jewels that decked the persons of the princes 200465 and people, shed their lustres on the faces of all.
200466
200467 15. There was a commingled tinkling of the bracelets and armlets of 200468 the throng caused by the collision of their bodies (in their egress), 200469 and mixed flashing of the necklaces and brocades that decorated their 200470 persons.
200471
200472 16. The jewels attached to the tufts and crests of hair on the tops of 200473 their heads, emitted a jingling sound resembling the humming of bees
200474 amidst their flowery braids.
200475
200476 17. The face of the sky on all sides, that shone with a purple hue 200477 reflected by the golden ornaments on their persons, seemed as it was 200478 pleased with the wise sayings and sense of the sage.
200479
200480 18. The aerial visitants vanished in the air, and the earthly guests
200481 repaired to their respective habitations on earth where they all 200482 performed their daily (evening) services in their own residences.
200483
200484 19. In the meantime sable night made her appearance on earth, and like 200485 a bashful young lady, withdrew to the closet apart from the rest of 200486 mankind.

200487
200488 20. The lord of the day passed to other lands to shine upon them, for 200489 verily it is the avowed duty of every good person to give the benefit 200490 of equal light to all.
200491
200492 21. The shade of evening veiled all sides, and uplifted the canopy 200493 of the starry sphere on high, which like the vernal atmosphere, was 200494 emblazoned with the starlike flowers of _kinsuka_.
200495
200496 22. The birds of air took to their repose in the hollows of mango
200497 trees, or on the tops of Kádamba arbours, as honest people of fair
200498 dealing, find their rest in the purity of their minds, and contriteness
200499 of their inward hearts.
200500
200501 23. The skirts of the clouds tinged with red by the slanting beams of 200502 the setting sun, and with a shade of yellow hue upon them, decorated 200503 the western hills with vests of yellow garb while the sky crowned their 200504 heads with gemming wreaths of starry groups.
200505
200506 24. The Goddess of evening (Vespera), having departed after receiving 200507 her homage (by the vespers of mankind), was followed by her train of 200508 dark night shades, appearing as black-bodied fiends—Vetálas (night 200509 roving _nisácharas_ of deserts).
200510
200511 25. A gentle and cooling breeze was blowing softened by the dew drops 200512 of night, and opening the petals of the Kumuda flowers (nylumbium), and 200513 bearing their fragrance all around.
200514
200515 26. A thick gloom covered the face of nature, and the stars were hid 200516 under the mists of night, and all the quarters of the skies, seemed 200517 with their overhanging loose and hairy mists, as the faces of widows 200518 shrouded by the dark dishevelled hair of mourning (for their departed 200519 lord the sun).
200520
200521 27. Now appeared the moist orb of the moon in her ambrosial form in the 200522 milky ocean of the sky, to moisten the mundane heat with her milk-white 200523 beams (sudhá-subhra-dídhiti).
200524
200525 28. On her rising, the thick mists of darkness fled from the eastern 200526 hemisphere, and became invisible in the air; as the darkness of 200527 ignorance is put to flight from the minds of monarchs, by their 200528 attendance to the sayings of wisdom.
200529
200530 29. Then the sages and seers, the rulers and priests of the people,
200531 took their rest in their respective beds, as the words of Vasishtha
200532 which were full of meaning, reposed in the recesses of their hearts.
200533
200534 30. As the thick darkness of night, resembling the dark complexion of 200535 death, receded from the arena of the skies, there followed close on its 200536 foot-steps the dewy dawn of the day with her slow moving pace.
200537
200538 31. The twinkling stars now disappeared from the sky, as the flowers on 200539 the trees were blown away by the breeze, and strewn on the ground as 200540 the fallen stars of heaven.
200541
200542 32. The sun became visible to the eyes, which his rays had roused from 200543 their sleep, as the new-rising faculty of reason becomes conspicuous in 200544 the minds of enlightened great souls.
200545
200546 33. Fragments of clouds shining with solar gleams, spread a yellow
200547 mantle over the eastern hills, which were still decorated with strings 200548 of stars, pendant on the crests of their lofty heads (like strings of 200549 pearls suspended to the crowns of kings).
200550
200551 34. All the terrestrial and celestial congress assembled again at the 200552 royal hall, in the order and manner (of their meeting) of the day 200553 before, after the performance of their morning services. (Originally 200554 _prátaśtanáh_ matins or matutinal ceremonies).

200555
200556 35. The whole assemblage took their seats as on the previous day, and 200557 sat unmoved in their places, as a lotus-lake in its calmness after a 200558 storm.

200559
200560
200561 SECTION II.

200562
200563 NATURE OF THE MIND.

200564
200565 36. Then Rāma addressed the most eloquent of sages Vasishtha, with his 200566 mellifluous words regarding the subject under investigation (the nature 200567 of the mind).

200568
200569 37. He said:—Tell me plainly, O venerable sir! about the form of the 200570 mind, which developed itself in all things of the universe, as they 200571 were offshoots of it (or manifestations of the mind).

200572
200573 38. Vasishtha replied:—Rāma! there is no form whatever of the mind, 200574 that may be seen by any body. It has nothing substantial besides its 200575 name as that of the formless and irremovable vacuity: (with which 200576 it is compared in its all-comprehensiveness, all-diffusiveness and 200577 all-pervasiveness).

200578
200579 39. The mind as an ens or entity (sat), is not situated in the outer 200580 body (or any part of it), nor is it confined in the cavity of the 200581 inward heart or brain. But know it O Rāma, to be situated everywhere, 200582 as the all encompassing vacuum. (Being all-pervading and all-diffusive 200583 in its nature as vacuity itself).

200584
200585 40. This world is produced from it, and likens to the waters of the 200586 mirage. It manifests itself in the forms of its fleeting thoughts, 200587 which are as false as the appearance of secondary moons in the vapours.

200588
200589 41. The thinking principle is generally believed as something 200590 intermediate between the positive and negative, or real and unreal, you 200591 must know it as such and no other (i.e. neither material as the body, 200592 nor immaterial as the soul, but a faculty appertaining to the nature of 200593 both).

200594
200595 42. That which is the representative of all objects is called the mind:
200596 there is nothing besides to which the term mind is applicable.

200597
200598 43. Know volition to be the same as the mind, which is nothing
200599 different from the will, just as fluidity is the same with water, and 200600 as there is no difference between the air and its motion in the wind.
200601 (The inseparable property answering for its substance).

200603 44. For wherever there is any will, there is that attribute of the mind
200604 also and nobody has ever taken the will and the mind for different 200605 things.

200607 45. The representation of any object whether it is real or unreal is 200608 mind, and that is to be known as Brahma the great father of all.

200609
200610 46. The incorporeal soul in the body is called the mind, as having the 200611 sensuous knowledge or everlasting ideas of the corporeal world in 200612 itself. (i.e. The sentient and thinking soul is the same with mind).

200613
200614 47. The learned have given the several names of ignorance, intellect, 200615 mind, bondage, sin and darkness, to the visible appearance of creation.

200616
200617 48. The mind has no other image than that (of a receptacle and 200618 reflector of the ideas) of the visible world, which, I repeat to say, 200619 is no new creation (but a reflexion of the mind).

200620
200621 49. The visible world is situated in an atom of the great mind, in the 200622 same manner, as the germ of the lotus plant is contained within its 200623 seed.

200624
200625 50. The visible world is as innate in the all-knowing mind, as the 200626 light is inherent in the sun-beams, and velocity and fluidity are 200627 inborn in the winds and liquids.
200628

200629 51. But the visionary ideas of the visibles are as false and fleeting 200630 in the minds of their observers, as the form of a jewel in gold, and 200631 water in the mirage; and as wrong as the foundation of a castle in the 200632 air, and the view of a city in a dream.
200633

200634 200635 SECTION III.

200636 200637 KAIVALYA OR MENTAL ABSTRACTION. 200638

200639 52. But as the phenomenals appear as no other than real to their 200640 observer, I will O Ráma! cleanse them now from thy mind as they do the 200641 soil from a mirror.
200642

200643 53. As the disappearance of an appearance makes the observer no
200644 observer of it, know such to be the state of the abstraction of the 200645 mind from whatever is real or unreal in the world. (This is called 200646 _Kevalíbháva_ or _non-chalance_ of all things).
200647

200648 54. This state being arrived, all the passions of the soul, and the 200649 desires of the mind, will be at rest, as torrents of rivers at the calm 200650 ensuing upon the stillness of the wind.
200651

200652 55. It is impossible that things having the forms of space, earth and 200653 air (_i.e._ material objects) will present the same features in the 200654 clear light (of induction), as they do to our open sight.
200655

200656 56. Thus when the observer comes to know the unreality of the phenomena 200657 of the three worlds, as well as of his own entity, it is then that his 200658 pure soul attains to the knowledge of _kaivalya_ or solity of divine 200659 existence.
200660

200661 57. It is such a mind that reflects the image of God in itself as in 200662 a mirror; while all others are as blocks of stone, and incapable of 200663 receiving any reflexion at all.
200664

200665 58. After suppression of the sense of _ego_ and _tu_ (or both the 200666 subjective and objective knowledge), and the error of the reality of 200667 the outer world the beholder becomes abstracted and remains without 200668 vision of external things in his sitting posture.
200669

200670 59. Ráma rejoined:—If the perception of entity is not to be put down,
200671 nor an entity become a non-entity nor when I cannot view the visibles
200672 (which are the causes of our error), as non-entities;
200673

200674 60. Then tell me O Bráhmaṇ! how to uproot this disease of our eagerness 200675 for the visibles from the mind, which bewilders the understanding, and 200676 afflicts us with a train of troubles.
200677

200678 61. Vasishtha replied:—Now hear my advice, Ráma, for the suppression 200679 of this phantom of phenomenon, whereby it will surely die away and 200680 become utterly extinct.
200681

200682 62. Know Ráma, that nothing that is, can ever be destroyed or become 200683 extinct; and though you remove it, yet it will leave its seed or trace 200684 in the mind.
200685

200686 63. This seed is the memory of such things, which reopens the ideas
200687 of the visibles in the mind, expanding themselves in the fallacious 200688 notions of the forms of big worlds and skies, mountains and oceans.
200689

200690 64. These (wrong notions) called _doshas_ or faults and defects of 200691 understanding, are obstacles in the way to liberation; but they do not 200692 affect the sages who are found to be liberated.

200694 65. Again if the world and all other things are real existences (as 200695 the Sánkhyas maintain): yet they cannot confer liberation on any one;
200696 because the visibles, whether they are situated within or without us
200697 are perishable themselves.
200698

200699 66. Learn therefore this dreadful proposition (solemn truth), which 200700 will be fully explained to you in the subsequent parts of this work.
200701 (Note:—A dreadful dogma it is to physicists and “_ádivádis_” or 200702 asserters of the _incipientes mundi_ or beginning of the world).
200703

200704 67. That all things appearing in the forms of vacuity, elementary
200705 bodies, the world, and _ego et tu_, are non-entities, and have no
200706 meanings in them.
200707

200708 68. Whatever is seen apparent before us, is no other but the supreme 200709 Brahma himself, and his undecaying and imperishable essence.
200710

200711 69. The plenitude of creation is an expansion of his plenum, and the 200712 quiet of the universe rests in his quietude. It is his _beom_ which is 200713 the substance of vacuum, and it is his immensity that is the substratum 200714 of the immense cosmos.
200715

200716 70. Nothing visible is real, and there is neither any spectator nor 200717 spectacle here. There is nothing as vacuity or solidity in nature, but 200718 all this is but a piece of extended Intelligence.
200719

200720 71. Ráma rejoined:—The adages relating the grinding of stones by the 200721 son of a barren woman, the horns of a hare, and the dancing of a hill
200722 with its extended arms;
200723

200724 72. And the oozing of oil from sand, the reading (of books) by dolls of 200725 marble, and the roaring of clouds in a painting, and such others are 200726 applicable to your words (of the reality of an unreal essence of God).
200727

200728 73. I see this world to be full of diseases, deaths and troubles, 200729 mountains, vacuities and other things, and how is it sir, that you tell 200730 me of their non-existence?
200731

200732 74. Tell me Sir, how you call this world to be unsubstantial, 200733 unproduced and inexistent, that I may be certain of this truth.
200734

200735 75. Vasishtha replied:—Know Ráma, that I am no inconsistent speaker, 200736 and hear me explain to you how the unreality appears as real, as the 200737 son of a barren woman has come to rumour.
200738

200739 76. All this was unproduced before, and did not exist in the beginning
200740 of creation. It comes to appearance from the mind like that of a city
200741 in a dream. (_i.e._ They are all but creations of the mind and fancy).
200742

200743 77. The mind also was not produced in the beginning of creation and 200744 was an unreality itself. Hear me tell you therefore, how we come to a 200745 notion of it.
200746

200747 78. This unreal mind spreads by itself the false and changing scenes of 200748 the visible world, just as we dream of changeful unrealities as true in 200749 a state of dreaming. (Here the dreaming philosopher sees dreams in his 200750 dream).
200751

200752 79. It then exerts its volition in the fabrication of the body and 200753 spreads far and wide the magic scene of the phenomenal world.
200754

200755 80. The mind by its potentiality of vacillation has many actions of its 200756 own, as those of expansion, saltation, and motion, of craving, roving, 200757 diving and seizing, and many other voluntary efforts (the causes of 200758 physical operations).
200759
200760
200761

CHAPTER V.

ON THE ORIGINAL CAUSE. (MÚLA-KÁRANA).

Ráma said:—Tell me, O chief of the sages! what cause is it that leads to our misconception of the mind, how it is produced and what is the source of its illusion.

2. Tell me sir, in brief of the first production (of the mind), and then, O best of the eloquent, you may tell the rest, that is to be said on the subject.

3. Vasishtha replied:—Incident to the universal dissolution, when all things were reduced to nothing, this infinity of visible objects remained in a state of calm and quiet before their creation.

4. There was then the only great God in existence, who is increate and undecaying, who is the creator of all at all times, who is all in all, and supreme soul of all, and resembling the sun that never sets.

5. He whom language fails to describe, and who is known to the liberated alone; who is termed the soul by fiction only, and not by his real nature (which is unknowable).

6. Who is the prime Male of Sánkhyā philosophers and the Brahma of Vedānta followers; who is the Intelligence of gnostics and who is wholly pure and apart from all (personalities).

7. Who is known as vacuum by vacuists, who is the enlightener of solar light, who is truth itself, and the power of speech and thought and vision, and all action and passion for ever.

8. Who though ever existent everywhere appears as inexistent to the world, and though situated in all bodies, seems to be far from them. He is the enlightener of our understanding as the solar light (of the world).

9. From whom the gods Vishnu and others are produced as solar rays from the sun; and from whom infinite worlds have come into existence like bubbles of the sea.

10. Unto whom these multitudes of visible creations return as the waters of the earth to the sea, and who like a lamp enlightens the souls and bodies (of all immaterial and material beings).

11. Who is present alike in heaven as in earth and the nether worlds; and who abides equally in all bodies whether of the mineral, vegetable or animal creation. He resides alike in each particle of dust as in the high and huge mountain ranges; and rides as swift on the wings of winds, as he sleeps in the depths of the main.

12. He who appoints the eight internal and external organs (Paryashtakas) of sense and action to their several functions; and who has made the dull and dumb creatures as inert as stones, and as mute as they are sitting in their meditative mood.

13. He who has filled the skies with vacuity and the rocks with solidity; who has dissolved the waters to fluidity, and concentrated all light and heat in the sun.

14. He who has spread these wonderful scenes of the world, as the clouds sprinkle the charming showers of rain; both as endless and incessant, as they are charming and dulcet to sight.

15. He who causes the appearance and disappearance of worlds in the sphere of his infinity like waves in the ocean; and in whom these phenomena rise and set like the running sands in the desert.

- 200831
200832 16. His spirit the indestructible soul, resides as the germ of decay 200833 and destruction in the interior (vitals) of animals. It is as minute as 200834 to lie hid in the body, and as magnified as to fill all existence.
200835
200836 17. His nature (Prakriti) spreads herself like a magic creeper (máyá 200837 latá) all over the space of vacuity, and produces the fair fruit in 200838 the form of the mundane egg (Brahmánda); while the outward organs
200839 of bodies, resembling the branches of this plant, keep dancing about 200840 the stem (the intelligent soul), shaken by the breeze of life which is 200841 everfleeting.
200842
200843 18. It is He, that shines as the gem of intelligence in the heart of 200844 the human body; and it is he from whom, the luminous orbs constituting 200845 the universe, continually derive their lustre.
200846
200847 19. It is that colossus of intelligence, which like a cloud sheds
200848 ambrosial draughts of delight to soothe our souls, and showers forth
200849 innumerable beings as rain drops on all sides. It bursts into incessant 200850 flashes showing the prospects of repeated creations which are as 200851 (momentary as) flashes of lightnings.
200852
200853 20. It is his wondrous light which displays the worlds to our wondering 200854 sight; and it is from his entity that both what is real and unreal, 200855 have derived their reality and unreality.
200856
200857 21. It is the insensible and ungodly soul, that turns to the 200858 attractions of others against its purpose; while the tranquil soul
200859 rests in itself (as in the spirit of God).
200860
200861 22. He who transcends all existences, and by whom all existent beings
200862 are bound to their destined actions in their proper times and places, 200863 and also to their free actions and motions and exertions of all kinds.
200864
200865 23. It is he who from his personality of pure consciousness, became of 200866 the form of vacuum (pervading all nature), and then by means of his 200867 vacuous mind and empty thoughts filled it with substances, wherein his 200868 soul was to reside, and whereon his spirit had to preside.
200869
200870 24. Having thus made the infinite hosts of worlds in the immense sphere 200871 of the universe, he is yet neither the agent of any action nor the 200872 author of any act in it; but remains ever the same as the sole one 200873 alone, in his unchangeable and unimpairing state of self-consciousness, 200874 and without any fluctuation, evolution or inhesion of himself, as he is 200875 quite unconcerned with the world.
200876
200877
200878
200879

200880 CHAPTER VI.

200881 ADMONITION FOR ATTEMPT TO LIBERATION.

200882
200883
200884 Mumukshu Pratyopadesa.
200885

200886
200887 Vasishtha said:—It is by the knowledge of this transcendent supreme 200888 spirit and God of gods, that one may become an adept (in divine 200889 service), and not by the rigour of religious austerities and practices.
200890 (Proficiency by theoretic knowledge).
200891

200892 2. Here nothing is needed than the culture and practice of divine 200893 knowledge, and thereby the truth being known, one views the errors of 200894 the world, as a satiate traveller looks at a mirage in a clear light.
200895

200896 3. He (God) is not far from nor too near us, nor is he obtainable by 200897 what he is not (as the adoration of images and ceremonial acts). He is 200898 the image of light and felicity, and is perceivable in ourselves.
200899

200900 4. Here austerities and charities, religious vows and observances, are 200901 of no good whatever. It is the calm quietude of one's own nature only 200902 that is serviceable to him in his services to God.

200903
200904 5. Fondness for the society of the righteous and devotedness to the 200905 study of good books, are the best means of divine knowledge; while 200906 ritual services and practices, serve only to strengthen the snare of 200907 our in-born delusions, which true knowledge alone can sever.

200908
200909 6. No sooner one has known this inward light of his as the very God, 200910 than he gets rid of his miseries, and becomes liberated in this his 200911 living state.

200912
200913 7. Ráma said:—Having known the Self in himself, one is no more exposed 200914 to the evils of life and even to death itself.

200915
200916 8. But say how is this great God of gods to be attained from such great 200917 distance (as we are placed from him), and what rigorous austerities and 200918 amount of pains are necessary for it.

200919
200920 9. Vasishtha replied:—He is to be known by means of your manly
200921 exertions (in knowledge and faith), and by the aid of a clear 200922 understanding and right reasoning, and never by the practice of 200923 austerities and ablutions, nor by acts attended with bodily pain of any 200924 kind. (Hence the mistake of _Hatha yoga_).

200925
200926 10. For know, O Ráma! all your austerities and charities, your 200927 painstaking and mortification are of no efficacy, unless you wholly 200928 renounce your passions and enmity, your anger and pride, your 200929 selfishness and your envy and jealousy.

200930
200931 11. For whoever is liberal of any money which he has earned by 200932 defrauding others, and with a heart full of vile passions, the merit of 200933 such liberality accrues to the rightful owner of the property and not 200934 to its professed donor.

200935
200936 12. And whoever observes any vow or rite with a mind actuated by 200937 passions, he passes for a hypocrite and reaps no benefit of his acts.

200938
200939 13. Therefore try your manly exertions in securing the best remedies 200940 of good precepts and good company, for putting down the diseases and 200941 disturbances of the world.

200942
200943 14. No other course of action except that of the exertion of one's 200944 manliness, is conducive to the allaying of all the miseries and 200945 troubles of this life.

200947 15. Now learn the nature of this manliness for your attainment to 200948 wisdom, and annihilation of the maladies of passions and affections and 200949 animosity of your nature.

200951 16. True manliness consists in your continuance in an honest calling 200952 conformable with the law and good usage of your country; and in a 200953 contented mind which shrinks from smelling the enjoyments of life.

200954
200955 17. It consists in the exertion of one's energies to the utmost of his 200956 power, without bearing any murmur or grief in his soul; and in one's 200957 devotedness to the society of the good and perusal of good works and 200958 Sástras.

200960 18. He is styled the truly brave who is quite content with what he 200961 gets, and spurns at what is unlawful for him to take; who is attached 200962 to good company, and ready at the study of unblamable works.

200963
200964 19. And they who are of great minds, and have known their own natures 200965 and those of all others by their right reasoning, are honoured by the 200966 gods Brahmá, Vishnu, Indra and Siva.

200968 20. He who is called a righteous man by the majority of the good people of the place, is to be resorted to with all diligence as the best and most upright of men.

21. Those religious works are said to compose the best Sástra, which treat chiefly of Spiritual knowledge; and one who constantly meditates on them, is surely liberated (from the bonds of this world).

22. It is by means of right discrimination derived from the keeping of good company and study of holy works, that our understanding is cleared of its ignorance, as dirty water is purified by _Kata_ seeds, and as the minds of men are expurgated by the Yoga philosophy.

CHAPTER VII.

RECOGNITION OF THE NIHILITY OF THE PHENOMENAL WORLD.

(_Drisyásattá Pratijnánam_).

Ráma said:—

Tell me, O Bráhmaṇ! where is this God situated and how can I know him, of whom you spoke all this, and whose knowledge you said, leads to our liberation.

2. Vasishtha replied:—This God of whom I spoke, is not at a distance from us. He is situated in these our bodies, and is known to be of the form of mere Intellect (_chinmátra_) to us. So says Fichte: The Infinite Reason (chit) alone exists in himself—the finite in him. Lewis vol. II. p. 563.

3. He is all in all, though all this world is not the omnipresent Himself. He is one alone and is not termed the all that is visible (to us). So Fichte: God is infinite and embraces the finite, but the finite can not encompass the Infinite. Lewis vol. II. p. 573.

4. It is this Intellect which is in Siva, that wears the cusp of the moon in his crest; the same is in Vishnu that rides on his eagle Garuda, and in Brahmá that is born of the lotus. The sun also is a particle of this Intellect (but they are not the self-same Intellect themselves).

5. Ráma rejoined:—So it is; and even boys say this also, that if the whole world is mere Intelligence (_chetana mátrakam_); then why call it by another name (as the world), and what is the use of giving admonition of it to anybody (when every one is full of intelligence).

6. Vasishtha replied:—If you have known the mere Intellect (_Chinmátram_), to be the same with the intelligent world (_chetana víswa_), you have then known nothing for getting rid of this world.

7. The world is verily intelligent, O Ráma (with the mundane soul); but the animal soul (_Jíva_) is called _pasu_ or brutish observer of things pasyati, on account of its looking after sensual gratifications only as brutes, and giving rise only to the fears of disease, decay and death (from its love of itself, and care for self-preservation).

8. The animal soul (_Jíva_), though an incorporeal substance, is an ignorant thing and subject to pain and sorrow. The mind _manas_ also, though it is capable of intelligence—_chetaníyam_, has become the root of all evils. (_i.e._ With its power of intellection and nature of intelligence (_chetanam_), it is yet ever inclined to the wrong side by itself).

9. Intellectual liberation (_chetya mukta_) from thoughts of the world, is one state (of the soul), and unintelligent gazing (_unmukhatá_) at it, is another. He who knows the better of these two the states of the soul, has no cause of sorrow (_i.e._ the rational from the irrational soul).

10. He who has seen the all surpassing Supreme Being, has his heartstrings all cut asunder, and the doubts of his mind all driven away. The sequences of his acts are washed away (and leave no fear of his transmigration).

11. The longing after perceptibles (_Chetyas_) does not cease, unless the perception of the visibles is effaced from the mind.

12. How then is this perception to be effaced? How is it possible to have a longing after the unintelligible Intelligence, without suppression of our longing for the visibles? It is only to be effected by avoiding the external perceptions of the mind.

13. Rāma said:—Tell me sir, where and how is that vacuous soul called pasu, by the knowledge of which no one can get rid of his transmigration (_i.e._ the worshippers of the _jīvātmā_ or animal soul called _jīvavādis_, are not entitled to their final liberation—_mukti_).

14. Tell me also, who is that man, who by his company with the good and study of good works, has gone over the ocean of the world, and beholds the Supreme soul in himself.

15. Vasishtha replied:—Whatever animal souls being cast in the wilderness of this life, long after this intelligent soul (_chetanā́tman_), they are truly wise, and know him (in themselves).

16. Whoso believes the animal soul as the life of the world (or mundane soul), and thinks (the knowledge of the) Intelligence to be attended with pain only, he can never know Him anywhere (in this world).

17. If the Supreme soul be known to us, O Rāma! the string of our woes is put to an end, like the fatal cholera after termination of its cholic pain or extraction of its poison.

18. Rāma said:—Tell me, O Bráhmaṇ! the true form of the Supreme soul, by light of which the mind may escape from all its errors.

19. Vasishtha replied:—The Supreme soul is seen in the same way in ourselves and within our bodies, as we are conscious of our minds to be seated within us, after its flight to distant countries.

20. Our notion of the Supreme spirit is often lost in the depth of our minds, in the same way, as the existence of the outer world (objective knowledge), becomes extinct in our consciousness in yoga meditation.

21. It is He in whose knowledge we lose our sense of the beholder and visibles, and who is an invacuous vacuum or a substantive vacuity himself. (_i.e._ Who being known, we forget our knowledge both of the subjective and objective, and view his unity as the only _to on_ or substratum of all). So Fichte: In thee, the Incomprehensible, does my own existence, and that of the world become comprehensible to me. Lewis. Phil. vol. II. P. 563.

22. He whose substance appears as the vacuum, and in whom subsists the vacuous plenum of the universe; and who appears as vacuity itself, notwithstanding the plenitude of his creation subsisting in him, is verily the form of the Supreme soul (that you want to know).

23. Who though full of intelligence, appears to stand as an unconscious huge rock before us; and who though quite subtile in his nature, seems as some gross body to our conception: such is the form of the Supreme soul (that you want to know).

24. That which encompasses the inside and outside of every thing, and assumes the name and nature of the very thing to itself, is verily the form of the Supreme (that you want to know).

25. As light is connected with sunshine and vacuity with the firmament and as Omnipresence is present with every thing and every where: such is the form of the Supreme spirit (that you want to know).

26. Ráma asked:—But how are we to understand that He who bears the name and nature of absolute and infinite reality should yet be compressed within any thing visible in the world, which is quite impossible to believe?

27. Vasishtha replied:—The erroneous conception of the creation of the world, resembles the false impression of colours in the clear sky; wherefore it is wrong, O Ráma! to take a thing as real, of which there is an absolute privation in nature.

28. It is the knowledge of Brahma that constitutes his form, or else there is no act of his whereby he may be known to us (the universe being but a development of himself). He is entirely devoid of any visible form, and therefore there is no better course for any one than to know him as truth.

29. After an absolute negation of the visibles comes to be known (_i.e._ after disappearance of the traces of phenomenals from the mind), there remains a pre-eminent object of conception, which is inborn and manifest of itself.

30. This concept (of the Super-eminent) has oftentimes no reflexion, owing to its having no visible appearance; and at others it is not without its reflexion on the mirror of the mind (which has received its image).

31. No body has ever conceived this transcendent verity in himself, who has not at the same time been convinced of the impossibility of the existence of the visible world. (_i.e._ Conviction of the nullity of the phenomenal alone, leads to the perception of the Reality).

32. Ráma rejoined:—Tell me, O sage! how the existence of so many extensive worlds composing the visible Universe, can be thought of as unreal, or comprised in the _chinmátram_ (or minutiae of the divine mind), as the mount Meru in the sesamum seed.

33. Vasishtha replied:—If you will but stay a few days in the company of holy men, and study the sacred Sástras with a steady mind with me:

34. Then I will purge away this false view of the visibles from your understanding, like the delusive mirage from one's sight. This absence of the view will extinguish your sense of being the viewer, and restore you to your intelligence alone.

35. When the viewer is united with the view, and the view with the viewer, there then turns out an unity of the duality, and the duality blends into an inseparable unity.

36. Without union of the two there is no success of either; and this union of both the viewer and the view having disappeared at last, there remains an only one unity (which is indissoluble).[2]

37. I will now cleanse away the dross of all your sense of egoism and tuism, with that of the world and all other things from the mirror of your mind, by bringing you to your consciousness of self, and total negation of every thing besides.

38. From nothing never comes a something, nor from something ever proceeds a nothing; and there is no difficulty whatever in removing what does not exist in nature (_i.e._ That a nil is nil is self evident, and no argument is required to prove it so).

39. This world which appears so very vast and extensive, was not in being at the beginning. It resided in the pure spirit of Brahma, and was evolved from the mind (_Chitta_) of Brahmá.

40. The thing called the world was never produced, nor is it in being nor in actual appearance. It is as the form of a bracelet in gold, which it is not difficult to alter and reduce to its gross metallic state.

41. I will explain it fully by other reasons, whereby this truth may appear of itself, and impress irresistibly in your mind.

42. How can that be said to have its being, which was not brought into being before, and how can there be a rivulet in the mirage, or the ring of an eclipse in the moon?

43. As a barren woman has no son nor a mirage any water in it; and as the firmament has no plant growing in it, so there is no such thing which we erroneously call the world.

44. Whatever you see, O Ráma! is the indestructible Brahma himself: this I have many times shown you with good reasons, and not in mere words (as my _ipse dixit_ only).

45. It is unreasonable, O intelligent Ráma! to disregard what a learned man speaks to you with good reasons; because the dull-headed fellow who neglects to listen to the words of reason and wisdom, is deemed as a fool, and is subject to all sorts of difficulties.

CHAPTER VIII.

NATURE OF GOOD SÁSTRAS.

Ráma asked:—How can it be reasonably shewn and established, that there is nothing to be known and seen in this world, although we have evident notions of it supported by sense and right reasoning?

2. Vasishtha answered:—It is from a long time, that this endemic of the fallacious knowledge (of the reality of the world), is prevalent (among mankind); and it is by means of true knowledge only that this wrong application of the word world, can be removed from the mind.

3. I will tell you a story, Ráma! for your success in (the attainment of) this knowledge; if you will but attend to it, you will become both intelligent and emancipate.

4. But if from the impatience of your nature like that of brute creatures, you get up and go away after hearing half of this (narrative), you shall then reap no benefit from it.

5. Whoever seeks some object and strives after it, he of course succeeds in getting the same; but if he become tired of it he fails therein.

6. If you will betake yourself, Ráma! to the company of the good and study of good Sástras, you will surely arrive at your state of perfection in course of a few days or months, according to the degree of your diligence.

7. Ráma said:—O you, that are best acquainted with the Sástras, tell me which is the best Sástra for the attainment of spiritual knowledge, and a conversancy with which may release us from the sorrows of this life.

8. Vasishtha replied:—Know, O high minded Ráma! this work (the Vásishtha Sanhitá) to be the best of all others on spiritual knowledge. It is the auspicious Great Rámáyana and the Sástra of sástras.

9. The Rámáyana is the best of histories, and serves to enlighten the understanding. It is known as containing the essence of all histories.

10. But by hearing these doctrines one easily finds his liberation coming of itself to him; wherefore it is reckoned as the most holy record.

11. All the existing scenes of the world will vanish away upon their mature consideration; as the thoughts occurring in a dream, are dispersed upon the knowledge of the dreaming state after waking.

12. Whatever there is in this work, may be found in others also, but what is not found here, cannot be found elsewhere (in other works); and therefore the learned call it the thesaurus (_sanhitá_) or store-house (of philosophy).

13. Whoever attends to these lectures every day, shall have his excellent understanding undoubtedly stored with transcendent knowledge of divinity day by day.

14. He who feels this Sástra disagreeable to his vitiated taste, may take a fancy to the perusal of some other sástra that is more wordy and eloquent.

15. One feels himself liberated in this life by the hearing of these lectures, just as one finds himself healed of a disease by a potion of some efficacious medicine.

16. The attentive hearer of these sermons, perceives their efficacy in himself, in the same way as one feels the effects of the curses or blessings pronounced upon him which never go for nothing (but have their full effects in time).

17. All worldly miseries are at an end with him, who considers well these spiritual lectures within himself, and which is hard to be effected by charities and austerities, or performance of the acts ordained in the _srautá_ or ceremonial vedas, or by hundreds of practices in obedience to the ordinances appointed by them.

CHAPTER IX.

ON THE SUPREME CAUSE OF ALL. (PARAMA KÁRANA).

Vasishtha continued:-

They are truly delighted and gratified (in their souls), who are ever devoted with all their hearts and minds in holy conversation among themselves.

2. Those that are devoted to the acquisition of knowledge and investigation of spiritual science, enjoy the same bliss of liberation in their living state, as it is said to attend on disembodied souls.

3. Ráma said:-Tell me O Bráhma! the distinct natures of the living and disembodied liberations, that I may try to learn the same, with an understanding enlightened by the light of Sástras (literally, having the eye-sight of Sástras).

4. Vasishtha said:-Who ever remains as he is (_i.e._ without any perturbation in his worldly course), and continues intact as vacuity amidst society: such a one is called the living liberated (Jívan mukta).

5. Who so is employed in his intellection only and seems to be sleeping in his waking state, though while conducting his worldly affairs: such a one is called the living liberated.
6. Whose countenance is neither flushed nor dejected in pleasure or pain (in joy or grief and such other reverses); and who remains contented with what he gets: such a one is called liberated while he is living.
7. Whose waking is as a state of sound sleep, and who is not awake to the accidents of the waking state, and whose waking state is insensible of the desires incident to it: such a one is called liberated in his life.
8. Who though actuated by the feelings of affection, enmity, fear and the like, is at rest, and as clear and undisturbed as vacuity within himself: such a one is called liberated while he is alive.
9. Who has not an air of pride in him, and is not conceited (with a notion of his greatness) when he does or refrains to do anything: such a one is called self-liberated in his life time.
10. Who at one glance or winking of his eye, has a full view of the whole creation and final destruction of the world, like the Supreme self (to which he is assimilated): such a one is said to be liberated in his life time.
11. Who ever is not feared by nor is afraid of any body, and who is freed from the emotions of joy, anger and fear: such a one is liberated in life.
12. Who is quiet and quietly disposes his business of this world, and who though he stands as an individual in the sight of men, attaches no individuality to himself; and who though a sentient being, is insensible to all impressions: such is the living liberated soul.
13. Who being full of all possessions, and having every thing present before him, remains cold and apathetic to them, as if they were useless to him: such a man is liberated in his life.
14. Now leaving the subject of "living liberation," I will tell you what they call the "disembodied liberation," which like a breath of wind enters into the soul, after it has fled from the mortal body.
15. The disembodied free spirit neither rises nor sets (like the sun), nor is it subject to wane (like the moon); it is neither manifest nor hidden; it is not at a distance, nor is it in me, thee or in any other person.
16. It shines forth in the form of the sun, and preserves the world in the manner of Vishnu. It creates the world in the shape of the lotus-born Brahmá, and destroys all as Rudra or Siva.
17. It takes the form of the sky supported on the shoulders of air, which supports all living beings, the gods, sages and demigods in the three worlds. It takes the form of boundary mountains and separates the different regions (of the earth and skies).
18. It becomes the earth and supports these numerous sets of beings, it takes the forms of trees, plants and grass, and yields fruits and grains for supportance (of all living creatures).
19. It takes the forms of fire and water and burns and melts in them by itself. It sheds ambrosia in the form of the moon, and causes death in the shape of poison.
20. It becomes light wherewith it fills the space of the firmament, and spreads darkness in the form of Erebus (_tama or Teom_). It becomes vacuum (_vyom or beom_) to leave empty space for all, while in the form of hills it obstructs their free passage on earth.

21. In the form of the fleet mind, it moves the self-moving animals, and in that of dull matter it settles the unmoving immovables. It girds the earth by its form of the ocean, as a bracelet encircles the arm.

22. The bodiless spirit takes upon it the great body of the sun, and illumines all the worlds with their minute particles, while it remains quiet in itself.

23. Whatever is shining in this universe or ever was or is to be so, in any of the three—past, present and future times, know them all O Ráma! as forms of the Divine Spirit (which is free to take any shape it likes).

24. Ráma said:—Tell me, O Bráhman! why this view of liberation, appears so very difficult to me, as to make me believe it altogether incomprehensible to and unattainable by any body.

25. Vasishtha replied:—This (disembodied) liberation is called nirvána or total extinction of self-consciousness, and is styled Brahma also (in whom the human soul is finally absorbed). Attend now to the means of its attainment.

26. All such visible objects known as I, thou, this &c., being unproduced (anutpanna) from the eternal sat or entity of God, it is impossible to have any conception of them in our minds.[3]

27. Ráma said:—Methinks, O best of them that know the knowable! that the bodiless souls of the liberated, when they pass through the bounds of the three worlds, have again to be born according to the course of nature.

28. Vasishtha replied:—Those that retain the reminiscence of the three worlds have to move about in them, but such as have lost the idea of their existence, are absorbed in infinity.

29. For how can one derive the knowledge of the unity of God from his belief in the duality of the separate existence of the world? Therefore the figurative sense of cosmos as God (Viswa) can not give the spiritual and infinite idea of Brahma.

30. He is no other but himself, of the nature of pure intellect, and of the form of the clear and tranquil vacuum (that pervades all things). Brahma is said to be the world, to signify his manifestation of its unreality as a reality unto us.

31. I have well considered about a golden bracelet, and found nothing as a bracelet in it save its gold. (The form is changeable, but the substance is real).

32. I observed the billows, and found nothing in them but water; and where there was no water I saw no billow to rise. (It is the substance and not its shape or shadow that is to be looked into).

33. I see no oscillation any where except in the winds, which are no other than this force in motion, and moving all things in the world. (Thus the spirit of God is the fountain or primum mobile of all forces, which are but forms of the main force).

34. As vacuity abides in air, and water appears in the burning deserts, and as there is light spread over all creation; so is the spirit of Brahma manifest in the three worlds in the forms of the very worlds.

35. Ráma said:—Tell me, O sage! the cause which makes this world with its nature of absolute negation or non-existence, to exhibit such distinct appearances in its phenomena.

36. Tell me also, how the viewer and the view (of these worlds) being both extinct (as they are equally unreal in their nature), there remains their nirvána or absorption in the Deity without their personalities.

37. Again as it is impossible to conceive the existence of the visible objects, say how is it possible to conceive the existence of the invisible Brahma in his own nature (of incomprehensibility).

38. Say by what mode of reasoning this truth may be known and ascertained, and this being accomplished, there remains nothing else to be inquired into.

39. Vasishtha replied:—This false knowledge or prejudice of the reality of the world, has been long prevalent like a chronic disease (among mankind); and requires to be removed by the specific charm (mantra) of reasoning only.

40. It can not however be expelled quickly and in a minute, but requires length of time, like the ascent and descent of an even sided precipice.

41. Therefore hearken to what I say, for dispelling your fallacy of the world, by means of arguments, logical inferences, and habitual meditation (about the nature of God).

42. Attend now Ráma! to a tale that I am to tell you for your attainment of this knowledge, and by the hearing of which you will become intelligent, wise and liberated.

43. I will even now relate to you the subject of the production of the world, in order to show you, that all that is produced serves to bind our souls to the earth, and that you may live quite free from the same.

44. I will tell you at present under this topic of creation, that the erroneous conception of the world is as unsubstantial as Vacuum itself. (i.e. All this is null and void).

45. Because this world which appears to contain these moving and unmoving beings, and abounds in various races of gods, Asura-giants and Kinnara-pigmies.

46. All these together with the Rudras and other demigods, become invisible and lose themselves in nothing at the ultimate dissolution of the world. (This final disappearance tirobháva of all things, proves their present appearance ávirbháva to be mere phantoms of our brain. Gloss).

47. Then there remains a moist and hollow deep, without light and thick spread with mist; all undefinable and undeveloped, save something which is Real and lasts for ever.

48. There was no air nor form of any thing, no sight nor any thing to be seen. There were not these multitudes of created and material beings, that appear to be endless and everlasting to view.

49. There was a nameless self, the fullest of the full in its form; it was no ens nor non ens, no entity nor non-entity, no reality nor unreality neither.

50. It was mere intellect without its intellection, infinite without decay, auspicious and full of bliss. It was without its beginning, middle and end, eternal and imperishable.

51. In him this world is manifest as a pearly goose in painting; He is and yet is not this (creation), and is the soul of both what is real as well as unreal. (Sadasadátman).

52. He is without ears, tongue, nose, eyes and touch, yet he hears, tastes, smells, sees and feels every thing in all places and at all times.

53. He is also that (intellectual) light (chidáloka), whereby the form of that real as well as unreal Being—sadasadátma—is discerned by us in his perspective of creation, as one without beginning or end, and presenting a representation that is without any colour or shade.

[4]54. He is that vacuous Soul who views the worlds as clearly, as the yogi beholds Him in the form of ineffable light, with his half closed eyes, and fixing his sight to the midst of his eyebrows (in his khecharí mudrá—or aerial mode of meditation).

55. He is the cause of all, and whose cause is as nil as the horns of a hare; and whose works are all these worlds, like so many waves of the sea.

56. His light is ever shining every where, and he has his seat in the human heart; and it is from the candle light of his intellect, that all the worlds derive their light.

57. It is He without whose light the sun would dwindle into darkness; and whose existence alone gives the world its appearance of a mirage.

58. It is his pulsation that vibrates throughout the universe, and it is his inertia that stops the course of the whole; it is on that pivot that the world has its revolution, just as the turning round of a fire brand describes a circle.

59. His nature is pure and unchangeable; and the works of creation and destruction, are mere acts of his volition (Vilása), in the persons of Brahma and Hara.

60. It is his inertia and force that gives rest and motion to all things, like the ubiquitous course of the winds. But this is the common belief that he moves, while in reality his nature is free from all mutability (like the immovable rock).

61. He is always awake in his ever sleeping state, and therefore can neither be said to be waking nor sleeping any where or at any time, but is both awake and asleep every where and at all times.[5]

62. His quiescence is attended with bliss and tranquillity, and his agitation puts the world in motion and in its course of action; which is said to remain unaltered in both states which unite in him.

63. He is inherent in all things as fragrance is innate in the flower, and is indestructible as its odour at the destruction of the flower. He pervades all things, and is yet as intangible as the whiteness of linen.

64. Who though speechless, is the author of all speech and sound, and who though he appears to be as incogitant as a stone, is full of cogitation (being the intellect itself). Who though fully satisfied with his bliss, enjoys all things, although he requires nothing for himself.

65. Who though bodiless actuates all the members of the body; and is attributed with a thousand arms and eyes (in the Veda); and who having no support for himself, is yet the support of all, and pervades the whole without being seated any where.

66. Who having no organs nor organic power, is the organ of organs, and performs the functions of innumerable organs; and who without a sensorial mind, exhibits endless designs of his Divine mind in the infinity of creation.

67. It is for want of our (knowledge) of him, that we are in constant dread of this delusive world as in that of a dragon or hydra; but it is at his sight (or by our knowledge of him), that all our fears and desires fly away afar from us.

68. It is in the presence of the clear light of that God of Truth, that all the wishes of our minds have a better play, just as actors dance the best as long as they have the lights.

69. It is by him that a hundred series of visible objects (as pots and plates—_ghata-patádi_), rise every moment to our view, like the ceaseless series of waves, billows and surges rising on the surface of the waters.

70. It is he that exhibits himself otherwise than what he is, in hundreds of different shapes to our mistaken minds, as the substance of gold is made to appear to our view in the various forms of bracelets, armlets, and a hundred other sorts of trinkets.

71. He who manifests himself as the soul, abiding in me, thee and in this or that person, and is neither myself, thyself, himself nor itself, is the Supreme soul or Self, that is the same with and apart from all.

72. It is he and the self-same being, whether you view him in one or more objects, as it is the same water that heaves itself in this one or the other wave. Thus all visible phenomena have their rise from him.

73. He from whom time has its counting and the visibles have their view; by whom the mind exercises its thinking powers, and by whose light the world is enlightened; is the Supreme.

74. Whatever forms, figures and their actions, whatsoever flavours and odours, and what sounds, touch, feelings and perceptions soever, you are sensible of, know them all and their cause also to be the Supreme.

75. You will be able to know your soul, O good Ráma! if you will take it in the light of the sight or faculty of vision, that lies between the looker and the object looked upon.

76. Know it as increate and indestructible, and without beginning and end. It is the eternal and everlasting Brahma and bliss itself. It is immaculate and infallible, highly adorable and unblamable in its nature. It is beyond all description and a mere void in its form. It is the cause of causes and a notion of something that is unknowable. It is the understanding, and the inward faculty of the intellect or the mind. (_i.e._ It is a spiritual substance and must be known in the spirit).

CHAPTER X.

DESCRIPTION OF THE CHAOTIC STATE.

Ráma said:—That which remains incident to the Universal dissolution (_mahá-pralaya_), is commonly designated by the term "formless void."

2. How then said you, there was no void, and how could there be no light nor darkness neither?

3. How could it be without the intellect and the living principle, and how could the entities of the mind and understanding be wanting in it?

4. How could there be nothing and not all things? Such like paradoxical expressions of yours, have created much confusion in me.

5. Vasishtha said:—You have raised a difficult extra-question, Ráma! but I shall have no difficulty to solve it, as the sun is at no pains to dispel the nocturnal gloom.

6. On the occasion or the termination of a great _kalpa age_, when there remains That Entity (the _Tat sat_) of God, it cannot be said to be a void, as I will now explain to you. Attend Ráma and hear.

7. Like images carved in bas-relief upon a pillar, was this world situated _in relieve_ of That Entity, and cannot be said to have been a void.[6]

8. Again when there was the representation of the plenitude under the appellation of the world at any place (in the essence of God), and be it real or unreal, it could not have been a void and vacuity.

9. As a pillar with carved or painted figures, cannot be said to be devoid of them; so Brahma exhibiting the worlds contained in him, can not become a void. (_i.e._ As a pillar is not devoid of figures which has carved images on it; so Brahma is not a void, having the worlds contained in him. This is a negative enthymem).

10. But the world contained in Brahma, becomes both something and nothing; as billows in calm waters may either exist or not exist. (So the appearance and disappearance of the worlds in Brahma, like those of the little billows in a quiet lake, prove their existence and non-existence at the same time, as it is predicated of the Chaos or the _Mahápralaya_. Gloss).[7]

11. Again it happens that certain figures are marked on some insensible trees in some places by the hand of time, which people mistake for images; so it comes to pass that certain figures of evanescent matter, occur in the eternal mind, which men mistake for the real world.

12. This comparison of the figured pillar and tree and the world, is a partial and not complete simile; the similitude here referring only to the situation of the transient world in the substance of the permanent Brahma (like the appearance of false figures in the firmly fixed pillar and on the standing tree).

13. But this appearance of the world is not caused by another (as in the case of the pillar, figures and pictures carved and painted by the hands of the statuary and painter). It rises, lasts and sets spontaneously and of itself in the self-same essence of Brahma (as the figures in the tree or the waves of the Ocean). It is the property of the divine soul and mind to raise and set such imageries in them by turns, like the creations of our imagination.[8]

14. The meaning of the word void (_súnya_) instead of no void (_asúnya_) or existence, is a fiction as false as inanity is a nullity in nature. Something must come out of something, and never from a void nothing; and how can nothing be reduced to nothing in the end- _mahápralaya_ (_súnyatá súnyate katham_)? (_Ex nihilo nihil fit, et in nihilum nihil reverti posse_).

15. In answer to your second question it has been said "there was darkness neither." Because the divine light of Brahma (which existed before creation), was not like the light of a material luminary (which is followed by darkness). The everlasting light was not to be obscured by darkness, like the sunshine, or moon-light or the blazing of fire or the twinkling of stars or our eyes.

16. It is the absence of the light of the great celestial luminaries, that is called darkness, and there being no material property in the immaterial essence of God, there could be no such light or darkness with him before creation.

17. The light of the vacuous Brahma is an internal perception of the soul, and is only felt and perceived within one's self, and never externally by any body; nor is this spiritual light ever clouded by any mist or darkness of temporal objects.

18. The indestructible Brahma is beyond and free from external and visible light and darkness; and is above the region of vacuum which is contained, as it were, within his bosom, and contains the universe as sheathed within its hollow womb.

19. As there is no difference between the outside and inside of a fruit (both of which is the same thing); so there is no shade of difference betwixt Brahma and the universe (the one pervading and the other pervaded by his spirit).

20. As the billow is contained in and composed of the water and the pot of the earth, so the world being contained in Brahma, it can not be said as null and void, but full of the spirit of God.

21. The comparison of earth and water does not agree corporeally with the spiritual essence of God, whose vacuous spirit contains and comprises the whole (Visva) within itself, as those elements do their component parts and productions.

22. Now as the sphere of the intellect is clearer and brighter far than the spheres of air and empty space; so the sense and idea of the word world as situated in the divine mind, is clearer in a far greater degree than this visible world appears to us.

23. (In answer to the third question with regard to the want of intellect), it is said thus:—As the pungency of pepper is perceived by one who tastes it, and not by him who has never tasted it; so the minutiae of the Intellect are known in the intellectual sphere by a cultivated intelligence, and by none who is without it.

24. Thus the Intellect appears as no intellect to one who is devoid of intelligence in himself (i.e. one having the Intellect, does not perceive it without a cultivated understanding). So this world is seen in the spirit of God or otherwise, according as one has cultivated or neglected his spiritual knowledge.

25. The world as it is, is seen either in its outward figure or in a spiritual light, as other than or the same with Brahma (by the materialist and spiritualist); but the Yogi views it in its fourth (turiya) state of susupta or utter extinction in his unconscious soul.

26. Therefore the Yogi, though leading a secular life, remains somnolent (Susupta) in his soul, and tranquil (Sánta) in his mind. He lives like Brahma unknown to and unnoticed by others, and though knowing all and full of thoughts in himself, he is as a treasury of Knowledge, unknown to the rest of mankind.

27. (In answer to the question how corporeal beings could proceed from the incorporeal Brahma). Vasishtha says:—As waves of various shapes rise and fall in the still and shapeless breast of the sea, so innumerable worlds of various forms, float about in the unaltered and formless vacuity of Brahma's bosom.

28. From the fullness of the Divine soul (Brahmátmá), proceeds the fullness of the living soul (Jívátmá), which is formless also (nirákriti). This aspect of Brahma is said to be owing to the purpose of manifesting himself (as living in all living beings).

29. So the totality of worlds proceeding from the plenum of Brahma, there remains the same sum total also as the plenitude of Brahma himself.

30. Considering the world as synonymous with Brahma in our minds, we find their identity (in the same manner), as one finds by taste the pepper and its pungency to be the same thing.

31. Such being the state of the unreality of the mind and its cognizables, their reflexions upon each other (i.e. of the mind upon the object and those of the object on the mind), are equally untrue as the shadow of a shadow. (Here is an utter negation of perception and perceptibles. There being no material substratum, the shadowy scene of the world is a mere mental synthesis. Berkeley).[9]

32. Know Brahma to be smaller than the smallest atom, and minutest of minutest particles. He is purer than air, and more tranquil than the subtile ether which is embosomed in him.

33. Unbounded by space and time, his form is the most extensive of all. He is without beginning and end, and an ineffable light without brightness in it. (He is the light of lights).

34. He is of the form of intellect—chit—and life eternal, without the conditions and accidents of vitality—jívatá. The Divine Mind has its will eternal, and is devoid of the desires of finite minds—chittata.

35. Without the rise of the intellect (i.e. its development), there is neither vitality nor understanding, no intellection nor any organic action or sensation, and no mental desire or feeling whatever (all of which are but products of the intellect or Ego).

36. Hence the Being that is full of these powers (and without which no power has its display), and who is without decline or decay, is seen by us to be seated in his state of tranquil vacuity, and is rarer than the rarefied vacuum of the etherial regions.

37. Ráma said:—Tell me again and more precisely of the form of this transcendental Being, who is of the nature of infinite intelligence, and which may give more light to my understanding.

38. Vasistha said:—I have told you repeatedly, that there is one supreme Brahma, the cause of causes, who remains alone by himself, when the universe is finally dissolved or absorbed in him. Hear me describe Him fully to you.

39. That which the Yogi sees within himself after forgetting his personality, and repressing the faculties and functions of his mind, in his Samádhi—meditation, is verily the form of the unspeakable Being.

40. As the Yogi who is absorbed in his meditation in absence of the visible world, and in privation of the viewer and visibles, and sees the light shining in himself, even such is the form of that Being.

41. Who having forgotten the nature of the living soul—jíva—, and his proclivity towards the intelligibles, remains in the pure light and tranquil state of his intellect (as in Yoga), such is the form of the Supreme Spirit.

42. He who has no feeling of the breathing of the winds, or of the touch or pressure of any thing upon his body; but lives as a mass of intelligence in this life; is verily the form of the Supreme.

43. Again that state of the mind, which a man of sense enjoys in his long and sound sleep, that is undisturbed by dreams and gnats, is verily the form of the Supreme.

44. That which abides in the hearts of vacuum, air and stone, and is the intellect of all inanimate beings, is the form of the Supreme.

45. Again whatever irrational and insensible beings live by nature, as without the soul and mind (as vegetables and minerals), the tranquil state of their existence is the nature of the Supreme Soul.

46. That which is seated in the midst of the intellectual light of the soul, and what is situated in the midst of the etherial light of the sun, and that which is in the midst of our visual light, is verily the form of the Supreme. (This passage admits of an occult interpretation in the Yoga system).

47. The soul which is the witness of our knowledge, of solar and visual lights and darkness, is without beginning and end, and is the form of the Supreme.

48. He who manifests this world to us, and keeps himself hidden from view, be he the same with or distinct from the world, is the form of the Supreme.

49. Who though full of activity, is sedate as a rock, and who though not a vacuum (being the plenum of all), appears yet as an empty vacuity, such is the form of the Supreme.

50. He who is the source and terminus of our triple consciousness of the knower, known and knowledge (i.e. from whom they rise and in whom they set by turns); is most difficult of attainment.

51. He who shines forth with the lustre of the triple conditions of the knowable, knower and their knowledge, and shows them to us as a large insensible mirror, is verily the form of the Supreme, who is here represented not as the cause-nimitta, but as the source-vivarta of the triple category.

52. The mind that is liberated from bodily activities (as in the waking Jagrat state) from its dreaming (as in the swapna or sleeping state), and is concentrated in the intellect (as in the state of susupti or sound sleep), and abides alike in all moving as well as unmoving bodies (as in the turiya or fourth state of the soul), is said to remain in the end of our being.

53. The intelligent mind which is as fixed as an immovable body, and freed from the exercise of its faculties, is comparable with the Divine Mind.[10]

CHAPTER XI.

SPIRITUAL VIEW OF CREATION.

Ráma said:—Tell me, O Bráhmaṇ, wherein this world abides at its last dissolution, when it does not retain its present form, nor this resplendent show (as we see in it now).

2. Vasishtha answered:—Tell me, Ráma, what is the form of the barren woman's son, and wherefrom he comes and where he goes, tell me also from where comes the sky-arbour (aerial castle), and where it remains.

3. Ráma replied:—There never was, nor is, nor ever will be the son of a barren woman or an arbour in the sky; why then ask about the form and figure of what is nothing?

4. Vasishtha said:—As there never was a barren woman's son or a forest in the air, so there existed no such scene as that of the world before.

5. That which has no existence at all, could have neither its production before, nor can it have its dissolution afterwards. What shall I then tell you regarding its genesis or exit.

6. Ráma rejoined:—The son of a barren woman and a forest in the sky are mere fictions, but the visible world is not so, which has both its beginning and end.

7. Vasishtha replied:—It is hard to have a comparison of the compared object, agreeing in all respects with what it is compared. The comparison of the world, is as a simile of those objects, which admit of no comparison (but with themselves).

201935
201936 8. The appearance of the world, is compared with that of a bracelet, 201937 because the one is as false as the other, and neither of them is real.
201938

201939 9. And as there is nothing in the sky except a negative emptiness, so 201940 the existence of the world in Brahma, is but a negative idea.
201941

201942 10. As the collyrium is no other than blackness, and as there is 201943 no difference between frost and its coldness, so the world is not 201944 otherwise than the great Brahma himself.
201945

201946 11. As coldness can not be negated of the moon and frost, so creation
201947 can not be negated of God. (Literally, creation is no negative property 201948 of Brahma, but essential to his nature).
201949

201950 12. As there is no water in a sea of the mirage, nor light in the new 201951 moon, so this world, as it is, does not abide in the pure spirit of God
201952 (in its gross state).
201953

201954 13. That which did not exist at first owing to its want of a cause, has 201955 neither its existence at present, nor can it be destroyed (when it is a 201956 _nil_ itself).
201957

201958 14. How is it possible for a dull material object to have any other 201959 cause but a material one; just as it is not the light (but some solid 201960 substance), that is the cause of a shadow.
201961

201962 15. But as none of these works, has come into existence without some 201963 cause, that cause whatever it is, is situated in these productions of 201964 it: (_i.e._ the author is displayed in his works).
201965

201966 16. Whatever appears as ignorance or delusion (as this world), has some 201967 appearance of intelligence or truth (of the Divinity) in it, as the 201968 delusion of the world seen in a dream, is the effect of the intellect 201969 within us. (Consciousness is awake in our dreams also).
201970

201971 17. As the illusion of the world in a dream, is not without our inward 201972 consciousness of it, in like manner Brahma was not unconscious of the 201973 expansion of the world, at the beginning of creation.
201974

201975 18. All this that we behold about us, is situated in the divine soul 201976 (in the same manner as the visions in our dreams, are but archetypes of 201977 our souls); there is no other world that rises and sets (but what is 201978 imprinted in our minds).
201979

201980 19. As fluidity is another name for water, and fluctuation the same 201981 with wind; and as sunshine is no other than light, so the world is 201982 naught but Brahma (displayed in nature).
201983

201984 20. As the figure of a city, resides in the inward intellect of one, 201985 who is conscious of his dreaming, in the same manner this world, is 201986 displayed in the Supreme soul.
201987

201988 21. Ráma said:—If it is so, then tell me, O Bráhma! whence is this 201989 our belief of its substantiality, and how this unreal and visionary 201990 _ideal_, presents its baneful visible aspect unto us.
201991

201992 22. For the view being in existence, there must be its viewer also, 201993 and when there is the viewer, there is the view likewise. As long as 201994 either of these is in existence, there is our bondage, and it is on the 201995 disappearance of both, that our liberation chiefly depends: (which can 201996 hardly take place).
201997

201998 23. It is entirely impossible to be so, as long as our notion of the 201999 view, is not lost in our minds, for unless the view is vanished both 202000 from the vision of the eyes and mind, no one can even form an idea of 202001 liberation in his mind.
202002

202003 24. Again the representation of the view at first, and its obliteration afterwards, is not enough for our liberation, because the remembrance of the view, is bondage of the soul.

25. Moreover when the picture of the view, is settled in the soul, and reflected in the mirror of the mind, there is no necessity of its recollection (for what is deeply rooted in the soul, comes out of itself).

26. The intellect which was without the notion of the visibles at first, would be entitled to liberation, were it not owing to the nature of the viewer (to imbibe the ideas of visibles).

27. Now sir, please to remove by your reasoning, my hopelessness of liberation, which I ween, is unattainable by any.

28. Vasishtha said:—Hear me, Ráma! explain to you in length, how the unreal world with all its contents, appears as real to us.

29. For unless it is explained to you by my reasoning, and the narratives and instances (of the practice of others), this doubt will not subside in your breast, as dirt sets down in the lake.

30. Then Ráma, you will be able to conduct yourself on earth, as one under assurance of the erroneous conception of the creation and existence of the world.

31. You will then remain as a rock against the impressions of affluence and want, and of gain and loss, and your relation with whatever, is fleeting or lasting and the like.

32. Mind, that there is that only one spirit, which is self-existent, and all besides is mere fiction. I will now tell you, how the triple world was produced and formed.

33. It was from Him, that all these beings have come to existence; while He of himself, is all and every thing in it. He likewise appears to us and disappears also, both as forms and their appearances, and as the mind and its faculties, and as figures and their shapes, and as modes and motions of all things.

CHAPTER XII.

THE IDEALISTIC THEO-COSMOGONY OF VEDÁNTA.

Vasishtha said:—

From the state of perfect quiescence and tranquillity of the supremely Holy spirit, the universe rose to being in the manner, which you must hear with your best understanding and attention.

2. As sound sleep displays itself in visionary dreams, so does Brahma manifest himself in the works of creation, of which he is the soul and receptacle: (_i.e._ who contains and forms and enlivens the whole).

3. The world, which of its nature is continually progressive in its course, is identic with the essence of that Being, whose form is selfsame with the ineffable glory of his eternally gemming Intellect (_chin-mani_).

4. This _chit_ or Intellect, then (_i.e._ after its inert quiescence), gets of itself an intellection (_chetýá_) in itself, before assuming to itself consciousness or the knowledge of egoism. (This is the first stage of the percipient soul).

5. Then this thinking Intellect (_chetýa-chit_), gets the notions

(bodhas) of some faint images (úhita-rúpas), which are purer and lighter than air, and which have received their names and forms afterwards. (The innate ideas are born in it before the embryonic mind or soul).

6. Afterwards this transcendent essence (Intellect), becomes an intelligent principle (sacheta), and eager for intelligence (chetana). It is now worthy of its name as Intellect or chit, on account of its attaining to what is called intelligence.

7. Lastly it takes the form of gross consciousness (ghana-samvedana), and receives the name of the living soul-jíva. It now loses its divine nature by reflecting on itself: (i.e. its own personality).

8. This living principle, is then involved in thoughts relating to the world only; but depends by its nature on the divine essence: (as the fallacy of the snake, depends on the substance of the rope).[11]

9. Afterwards there rises a void space into being, called Kham-vacuum (Arabic Kháviyetun), which is the seed or source of the property of sound, and which became expressive of meaning afterwards. (It is called ákása or sky-light from kása to shine, as light was the first work of God).

10. Next in order are produced the elements of egoism and duration in the living soul (i.e. the simultaneousness of the ideas of self-entity and duration in the living principle). And these two terms, are the roots of the subsistence of future worlds. (i.e. The individuality and durability of things).

11. This ideal knowledge, of the unreal forms of the net-work of world, in divine Spirit, was made to appear as a reality by the Omnipotent power. (i.e. The ideal world appeared afterwards as real).

12. Thus the ideal self-consciousness became the seed (or root) of the tree of desires, which were vacillated by egoism in the form of air.

13. The intellect in the form of the airy ego, thinks on the element of sounds (sabda tanmátram); it becomes by degrees denser than the rarefied air, and produces the element of mind.

14. Sound is the seed (or root) of words, which were afterwards diversified in the forms of names or nouns and significant terms; and the assemblage of words, as shoots of trees, is varied in padas or inflected words, vákyas or sentences, and the collections of Vedas and Sástras.

15. It is from this Supreme spirit, that all these worlds derived their beauty afterwards; and the multitude of words (which sprang from the sounds), and were full of meaning, became widely spread at last.

16. The Intellect having such a family as its offspring, is expressed by the word jíva (zoa) or the living soul, which became afterwards the arbor (or source) of all forms of beings, known under a variety of expressions and their significations. (i.e. The living god Brahmá became the cause of the formal world, from the tanmátra elements produced by Brahma).

17. The fourteen kinds of living beings, which fill the cells in the bowels of all worlds, sprang afterwards from this living soul. (These include all vegetable and animal life and all such as increase in bulk and growth).

18. It was then, that the Intellect by a motion and inflation of itself, and at an instantaneous thought, became the element tanmátra of touch and feeling (the air), which was yet without its name and action. (The Spirit breathed breathless. Sruti). This breath caused air, which expanded itself and filled all bodies, which are objects of touch and feeling.

19. The air, which is the seed (root) of the tree of tangibles, then developed itself into branches, composed of the (49) various kinds of winds, that are the causes of the breathings and motions of all beings.

20. Then the Intellect produced at pleasure and from its idea of light, the elemental essence of lustre, which received afterwards its different names (from the light of the sun and moon and the stars, as also from those of fire and lightning).

21. Then the sun, fire, lightning and others, which are the seeds (or roots) of the tree of light, caused the various colours of bodies that filled the world. (That light is the cause of colour, was known to the ancient Rishi).

22. It reflected on the want of fluidity, and produced the liquid body of waters, whose taste constitutes the element (tanmātra) of flavour.

23. The desire of the soul for different flavours (rasas), is the seed of the tree of taste, and it is by the relish of a variety of tastes, that the world is to go on in its course.

24. Then the self-willed Brahmá, wishing to produce the visible earth, caused the property of smell to appertain to it from his own element of it.

25. He made his elementary solidity, the seed or source of the tree of forms (morphology); as he made his own element of rotundity the substratum of the spherical world.

26. Those elements being all evolved from the Intellect, are again involved of themselves in it, as the bubbles of water rise and subside in itself.

27. In this manner, all those beings remain in their combined states, until their final dissolution into their simple and separate forms.

28. All those things, which are but forms and formations of pure Intellect, remain within the sphere of Divine Intelligence, as the germs of the big banian tree, reside in the forms of pollen and the seed.

29. These sprouted forth in time, and burst out into a hundred branches: and after having been concealed in an atom, became as big as they were to last for ever.

30. Such is the growth and multiplication of things by pervasion of the Intellect, until they are put to a stop by its contraction and when weakened in their bodies by its desertion, they droop down in the end.

31. Thus is this class of elementary tanmātras, produced in the Intellect out of its own volition, and are manifested in the form of formless minutiae to sight.[12] (trasaranus).

32. These five-fold elements are verily the only seeds of all things in the world. They are the seeds of the primary momentum that was given to them (in the beginning). In our notions, they are the seeds of elementary bodies, but in their real nature, they are the increate ideal shapes of the Intellect replenishing the world.

CHAPTER XIII.

ON THE PRODUCTION OF THE SELF-BORN.

Vasishtha said:—

Ráma! When the Supreme Brahma remains in his resplendent and tranquil state (before creation), there is no essence of etherial light or heat or even darkness produced in the intellectual spirit. (But they lie hidden there as if buried in oblivion).

2. The _Sat_-God has the attribute of _Chetya_-intellectuality at first, and it is from the intellection (_Chetana_) of his intellectual part (_Chetyánsa_), that the epithet of mind (_Chitta_) is attributed to him. The faculties (_Sakti_) of his intellect (_Chit_), are called its intelligence (_Chetaná_).

3. The _Chit_ or intellect has then the attribute of the Living soul (_Jíva_), from its intelligence (_Chetaná_), and connection with the _chetya_ or intelligible objects in nature. It is next attributed with the title of _máya_ or illusion, from the subjection of its _Chetya_ or cognizable objects only to itself—_Aham mátra_.

4. It has then the attribute of understanding (_buddhi_), from the excess of its egoism (_ahantá_), which is full with the purposes of its mind and the elements of sound &c. (_i.e._ with a desire for all sensible objects).

5. This (living, deluded and self reflecting) ego, is puffed up with thoughts of (possessing) all things, and looks upon the great harbour of the visible world (as the great garden for its pleasure and gain).

6. But the living souls, like so many evanescent objects seen in a dream, are made to rise and fall one after the other, in this great forest of the world surrounded by the skies.

7. But the world is (as continuous) as the grove of _Karajna_ plants, growing from unsown seeds; and its elementary bodies of the water, fire, earth and air, have no regard for any body; (that is living or dead).

8. The intellect which is the soul of the universe, creates afterwards the earth and all other things, as one remembering the objects of his dream (recalls them to his memory).

9. Wherever there is the germ of the world, it develops itself even at that place; the live elements are the five fold seed of the world, but the undecaying intellect is the seed of the quintuple (_pancha-bhúta_).

10. As is the seed so is its fruit; hence know the world to be a form and full of God; and the spacious firmament to be the reservoir of the quintuple elements in the beginning of creation.

11. The soul like the body, is composed of the powers of the Intellect, and does not subsist of itself; but being inflated by the same, it extends its bulk.

12. But the vacuous form of the intellect, which is seated in the spiritual body of the soul, cannot be composed of solid reality (as the primary elements of matter). This is not possible; hence nothing can come out from an impossibility.

13. Again that which is changeable in its form, cannot have its sameness at all times: hence if the essence of the quintuple elements, be attributed to Brahma, from the idea of their being the quintessence of his spirit, there can be no immaterial and immutable Brahma.

14. Therefore know this quintuple to be the developed Brahma himself, as he evolved them in the beginning, and as he is their producer for the creation of the world.

15. Thus He being the prime cause of their production, there is nothing that is produced (without) him, and the world is no product of itself.

16. The unreal appears as real as a city seen in a dream, and as a castle built in air by our hopes: so we place the living soul in ourselves, which has its foundation in the vacuous spirit of God.

17. Thus the brilliant spirit, which is situated in the Divine Intellect, being no earthly or any other material substance, is styled the living soul, and remains in vacuum as a luminous body rising in the sky.

18. Hear now how this vacuous living soul, comes to be embodied in the human body, after its detachment as a spark from the totality of vital spirits, in the empty sphere of divine Intellect.

19. The soul thinks itself as "a minute particle of light" at first, and then it considers itself as growing in the sphere of its consciousness.

20. The unreal appearing as real, proves to be unreal at last; as the fictitious moon becomes a nullity afterwards; so the soul continues to view itself subjectively and objectively both as the viewer and the view.

21. Thus the single self becomes double as one sees his own death in a dream; and thus it waxes into bigness and thinks its vital spark as a star. (This is the form of the lingadeha or sentient soul within the body).

22. As the soul goes on thinking itself the microcosm of the world (Viswarúpa), so it falsely thinks itself as such in reality, as it is expressed by the dictum "Soham" "so am I."

23. By thinking himself as such, man comes to believe it as true, as one believes himself as a traveller in his dream. So by thinking the soul as a star, he views it so within himself.

24. By continued meditation of his soul as such, he loses his external sensations, and views this star in his cranium.

25. He sees the soul within him though it be without him; just as the mirror reflects the distant hill in itself; and the soul remains confined within him, as a body is confined in a well, and as a sound is shut up in the hollow of a cave.

26. The consciousness of our dreams and desires, is but a particle (attribute) of the living soul, whose real form is that of a star waking (keeping watch) within us. (Consciousness of external objects in our dream and desire, is compared to the reflection of outward images in a glass or bubble of water, and to the echo of a distant sound in a hollow cave).

27. Now this vacuous life, which is composed of the essences of the mind, understanding and knowledge, resides in the hollow sheath of the star. (The star is supposed to be the eye-sight and residence of life. Gloss).

28. It appears to me to take its flight to the sky, to see what is passing there (i.e. the manner in which the mental eye of the Yogi penetrates the regions of air). And then it enters the body by two holes, which have the names of the external organs (of sight) given them afterwards. (The whole sphere of air is thought to teem with life or living souls and spirits, which rove free in the air, until they are made to enter and pass out of the body by two unknown holes, whether of the nostrils or sockets or glottis, remains undefined and undetermined).

29. The organs by which the embodied living soul, is to see (external objects), are called the eyes-netras (from their receiving (nayana) the light of the soul). That by which it is to feel, is styled the skin (twak or touch); and those whereby it is to hear, are termed the ears (srutis from sru to hear, corresponding with suna or shunu in vernaculars and Persian).

30. The organ of smelling is the nose-ghrána from its bearing the scent-ghrána to the soul; and that of taste is named as tongue rasaná, for its conducting the rasa taste or flavour to the spirit.

31. Then there is the breathing air (the air of breath or breath of life), which actuates the energies of the organs of action. It is this air which is the cause-of vision, and mover of the internal organs of the mind and thought.

32. This (vital breath) supports the embodied and all supporting soul (átiváhika-dehátma) in the vacuity of the body, and fills and kindles it as the air does a spark of fire.

33. The word Jíva or the living soul (zoa), is brought under a figurative sense, 'to mean something real in the unreal body'. Hence Brahmá is said to be the life and soul of the unreal world.

34. The gross embodied soul, is of the form of vacuum like the mind and yet it imagines itself to reside in an ovum in the body, as Brahmá is supposed to be seated in the mundane egg. (i.e. The soul loses its light airy shape and free range, by being confined in the body).

35. Some view the spirit of God as floating on the surface of the (ante-mundane) waters (in the form of Naráyana); and others view it in the person of the Lord of creatures (Brahmá); while there are others, who look at it as infused throughout the creation in the figure of viráj. These are called the subtile and gross bodies of the soul (sthúla and súkshma saríras).

36. The soul or spirit is the spacious womb of productions, and the means of executing its own purposes, and of knowing the proper time and place, and the article and the manner of action (modus operandi).

37. The mind is the inventor of words, expressive of ideas (in the soul), and subjects itself to the arbitrary sounds of its own invention. Hence God is erroneously said to be embodied in words (sabda Brahma of Mimánsá philosophy) in this world of errors.

38. The unproduced and self-born Brahmá, that has risen of himself (and represents the mind), is as unreal as the soaring of a man in the sky in his dream.

39. This all supporting-embodied soul, is the prime Lord of creatures, who is said to have formed this illusory frame of the world.

40. But there was nothing formed or born in it (in reality); nor is there any substance to be found in the world. It is the same vacuous form of Brahma still, whose essence is known to extend as the infinite space itself.

41. Things appearing as real, are as unreal as an imaginary city (Utopia), which presents a variety (of forms and colours) to the fancy, without being built or painted by any body. (The phenomenal appearance of the world, is likened to a phantasmagoria).

42. Nothing that is unmade or unthought of, can be real (either in substance or idea); and the gods Brahmá and others, being freed from their avocations at the universal dissolution of existence, could neither resume their functions nor have materials for the same.

43. The self-born Brahmá, having then neither his remembrance of the past, nor any material appliance at hand, could neither form an ideal or material world out of nothing. Therefore production of Brahmá and formation of the universe are alike (chimerical).

44. The earth and all other existences, are but the eternal ideas of the divine mind, and they appear to us as objects of a dream in our waking state: (when they vanish into airy nothing).

45. The divine spirit is known to be vacuum only, and so also is the world ever known to be: (because the like produces the like). So all waters are alike liquid bodies, though they are made to pass under different names.

46. This creation is every where the same in the Supreme Spirit. It is but an evolution of the same (though presenting different aspects to us); and the creator is always and everywhere immutable in his nature.

47. The vacuous universe, under the name of the mundane egg, shines as clearly as the Divine Spirit: it is calm in its appearance, and becomes disturbed by causes born in itself. (Nature is uniform, but ruffled by accidents).

48. It is supported by the supportless supporter of all, who is one and without a second, but devoid of unity in (the variety of his) creation. All this is born in his consciousness, and therefore there is nothing that is produced anew.

49. He, who is of the form of unlimited space, and without any vacuity in it (because nature abhors a vacuum); who is transparent yet teeming with abundance; who is the whole world (God in nature), without any worldliness in him; is verily the substratum of all.

50. He, who is neither the container nor the contained, nor the view of the world; who is neither the world nor its creator (Brahmá), and about whom there can be no dispute nor disputant; is verily the unknown God.

51. He, who is neither the passing world nor any of its passing things; who is quite at rest, yet situated in all things, (whether moving or quiescent); is the only Brahma that shines of himself in himself (as the soul of and all in all).

52. As we form in ourselves the image of a whirlpool, by the idea of the fluidity of water in our minds; so the sight of the world produces the false notion of its reality in the mind.

53. All unrealities become extinct at the end, as we see the death of our frail bodies in dreams. So we find on the contrary the essential part of our soul, to be unscathed by its own nature of indestructibility, and remaining in the form of everlasting consciousness in the atmosphere of our intellects.

54. Brahmá the prime Lord of creatures, is ever manifest by himself in the form of vacuity in the Supreme spirit; and he being of a spiritual form as the mind, has no material body formed of earth as all other corporeal beings; and is therefore both real and unborn (in his essence).

CHAPTER XIV.

ESTABLISHMENT OF BRAHMA.

Vasishtha added:—

In this manner the visible world, myself, thyself and all other things are nothing; all these being unmade and unborn are inexistent: it is the Supreme spirit only that is existent of itself.

2. The primeval vacuous soul is awakened at first of itself, and by its own energy from its quietness, and begins to have a motion in itself like the troubled waters of the deep.

3. It then begins to reflect in itself, as in a dream or in imagination, without changing its vacuous form, which is likened to a rock with the inward faculty of thought.
4. The body of the Great Viráj also, is devoid of any material form, either of earthly or any other elemental shape, (as it is viewed in the Vedas). It is purely a spiritual, intellectual and etherial form, and as transparent as the ether itself.
5. It is undecaying and steady as a rock, and as airy as a city seen in a dream. It is immovable as the line of a regiment represented in a picture.
6. All other souls are as pictures of dolls and puppets, painted and not engraven on the body of Viráj as upon a huge pillar; and he standing as an uncarved column in the empty sphere of Brahmá, represents all souls (and not bodies) as they are mere pictures on it.
7. The prime Lord of creatures is said to be self-born at first, and he is known as the increate (Brahmá), for want of his prior acts to cause his birth. (He is coeternal with the eternal Brahma, and is therefore not subject to birth and death).
8. The primeval patriarchs, who obtain their ultimate liberation at the final dissolution of the world, have no antecedent cause to be reborn as unliberated mortals. (So the emancipate souls of the living and dead, are freed from the doom of regeneration.)
9. Brahma, who is the reflector of all souls, is himself invisible in the inward mirror of other souls: (_i.e._ he reflects all images in himself, but never casts his own reflexion upon any). He is neither the view nor the viewer, and neither the creation nor the creator himself. (These being the functions of the creative and representative powers of Brahmá and Viráj).
10. Though thus negated of all predicates, yet is Brahma the soul of all predicables, that may be affirmed or denied of him (since he is all in all). He is the source of these chains of living beings, as light is the cause of a line of lighted lamps in illuminations.
11. The will of the gods (Brahmá and Viráj), proceeding from the volition of Brahma, is of that spiritual nature as the other; just as one dream rising in another, is equally unsubstantial as the first: (_i.e._ the products of spiritual causes, are also spiritual, by the rule of the homogeneity of the cause and effect).
12. Hence all living souls, which are evolved from the breathing of the Supreme Spirit, are of the same nature as their origin for want of an auxiliary causality. (God made man in his own image, and as perfect as himself: and this man is manas the Brahmá, or as he is named Adam, corresponding with Adima or Adyam purusham—the first male or Protogonus).
13. Want of a secondary agency, produces the equality of effects with their cause (as the fruits and flowers of trees, are of the same kind with the parent tree, unless there rises a difference in them by cause of engraftments). Hence the uniformity of created things, proves the conception of their creation by a secondary cause, to be wholly erroneous.
14. Brahma himself is the prime soul of Viráj and self-same with him, and Viráj is the soul of creation and identical with it. He is the vacuous vitality of all; and it is from him that the unreal earth and other things have their rise. (Viráj is the spirit of God diffused in nature).
15. Ráma said:—Tell me, whether the living soul, is a limited thing or an unlimited mass of life; or does the unbounded spirit of God, exist in the shape of a mountainous heap of living souls: (_i.e._ whether it is to be taken in a collective or integral sense, and whether it forms a totality—samashti existent in the Divinity, of which all individual souls are either as parts vyashti or separate existences).

16. Are these living souls like showers of rain-water falling from above, or as the drizzling drops of waves in the vast ocean of creation, or as the sparks of fire struck out of a red-hot iron, and from whence they flow, and by whom they are emitted.

17. Tell me sir, the truth concerning the profusion of living souls, and though I have a partial knowledge of it, I require it to be more fully and clearly explained by you.

18. Vasishtha replied:—There being but one living soul of the universe, you can not call it a multitude. Your question therefore is quite out of place, as the query about the horns of hares (which do not exist in nature).

19. There are no detached living souls, O Rāma, nor are they to be found in multitudes any where, nor was there a mountainous heap of souls known to have existed at any time.

20. Living soul is but a fictitious word, and it is heaped with many fictions, all of which, you must know for certain, do not apply to the soul.

21. There is but one pure and immaculate Brahma, who is mere Intellect (chinmātram) and all pervasive. He assumes to himself all attributes by his almighty power. (Here Brahma is represented not only as Omniscient and Omnipotent; but as saguna also by his assumption of all attributes).

22. The living soul is viewed by many to evolve itself from the intellect into many visible and invisible forms (mūrta-mutam); just as a plant is seen to develop itself into its fruits and flowers.

23. They add to their knowledge of the soul the attributes of the living principle, understanding, action, motion, mind and unity and duality, as if these appertain to its nature.

24. But all this is caused by ignorance, while right understanding assigns them to Brahma. The ignorant are bewildered by these distinct views (of the soul), and will not be awakened to sense.

25. These different believers are lost (in their various views), as the light is lost under darkness. They will never come to the knowledge of truth as it is the case with the ignorant.

26. Know Brahma himself as the living soul without any divisibility or distinction. He is without beginning or end. He is omnipotent, and is of the form of the great Intellect which forms his essence.

27. His want of minuteness (i.e. his fulness) in all places, precludes his distinctive appellations every where. Whatever attributes are given him (by fiction), are all to be understood to mean Brahma himself.

28. Rāma asked:—How comes it, O Brāhman? that the totality of the living souls in the world, is guided by the will of one universal soul, which governs the whole, and to which all others are subject.

29. Vasishtha replied:—Brahma the great living soul and Omnipotent power, remained from eternity with his volition (satya sankalpa—fixed determination) of creation, without partition or alteration of himself.

30. Whatever is wished by that great soul, comes to take place immediately. The wish it formed in its unity at first, became a positive duality at last. Then its wish "to be many" (Aham bahu syam_), became the separate existences afterwards.

31. All these dualities of his self-divided powers (the different living souls), had their several routines of action allotted to them, as "this is for that"; meaning "this being is for that duty, and such action is for such end".

32. Thus though there can be no act without exertion (by the general rule as in the case of mortals), yet the predominant will of Brahmá, is always prevailing without its exertion to action, (as in the case of saints whose wills are effective of their ends without the aid of action).

33. Though they that bear the name of living beings, effect their purposes by exertion of their energies, yet they can effect nothing without acting according to the law appointed by the predominant power.

34. If the law of the predominant power, is effective of its end (_i.e._ the law of action for production of acts); then the exertions of the subordinate powers (the living souls), must also be attended with success: (_i.e._ the attainment of the like result of the like action).

35. Thus Brahma alone is the great living soul that exists for ever and without end; and these millions of living beings are no other in the world (than agents of the divine energies).

36. It is with a consciousness of the intellectual soul (_i.e._ the inward knowledge of the divinity within themselves), that all living souls are born in this world; but losing that consciousness (their knowledge of God) afterwards, they became alienated from him.

37. Hence men of inferior souls, should pursue the course of conduct led by the superior souls, for regaining their spiritual life _átmajívatwam_, as the copper becomes transformed into gold (by chemical process).

38. Thus the whole body of living beings, that had been as inexistent as air before, come into existence, and rise resplendent with the wonderful intellect.

39. Whoso perceives this wondrous intellect in his mind, and gets afterwards a body and the consciousness of his egoism, he is then said to be an embodied living soul.

40. The mind that is gratified with intellectual delights, becomes as expanded as the intellect itself, and thinks those pleasures to constitute the sum total of worldly enjoyments.

41. The Intellect is said to remain unchanged in all its succeeding stages; and though it never changes from that state, yet it wakes (developes) by a power intrinsic in itself.

42. The uninterrupted activity of the Intellect, indulges itself in the amusement of manifesting the intelligibles in the form of the world (_i.e._ Of evolving the knowables from its own knowledge of them. Or it is the pleasure of the intellect to unfold the secrets of nature to view).

43. The extent of the intellectual faculty, is wider and more rarefied than the surrounding air, and yet it perceives its distinct egoism by itself and of its own nature. (The subjective knowledge of ego-self).

44. Its knowledge of self, springs of itself in itself like the water of a fountain; and it perceives itself (its _ego_) to be but an atom amidst the endless worlds.

45. It perceives also in itself the beautiful and wondrous world, which is amazing to the understanding, and which is thereafter named the universe. (i.e. The one existing in the other and not without it: meaning, the soul to be the seat of both the subjective and objective knowledge).

46. Now Rāma, our egoism being but a conception of the intellect is a mere fiction (kalpanā); and the elementary principles being but creatures of egoism, they are also fictions of the intellect.

47. Again the living soul being but a resultant of our acts and desires, you have to renounce these causes, in order to get rid of your knowledge of ego and tu (i.e. of the existence of yourself and that of others); and then you attain to the knowledge of the true one, after discarding the fictions of the real and unreal.

48. As the sky looks as clear as ever, after the shadows of clouds are dispersed from it, so does the soul look as bright as it existed at first in the intellect, after its overshadowing fictions have been removed.

49. The universe is a vacuum, and the world is a name for the field of our exertions. This vacuity is the abode of the gods (Viswa and Virāj, both of whom are formless). The wonderful frame of plastic nature, is but a form of the formless intellect and no other.

50. What is one's nature never leaves him at any time; how then can a form or figure be given to the formless Divinity?

51. The divine intellect is exempt from all the names and forms which are given to unintelligent worldly things, it being the pervader and enlivener, of all that shines in the world. (Intellect is the power of understanding).

52. The mind, understanding and egoism, with the elements, the hills and skies, and all things that compose and support the world, are made of the essences proceeding from the intellect. (The intellect from interlegere contains all things).

53. Know the world to compose the mind-chitta of the intellect-chit of God, because the mind does not subsist without the world. Want of the world would prove the inexistence of the mind and intellect which consist of the world. (Hence the identity of the intelligent world with the mind and intellect of God).

54. The intellect like the pepper seed, is possest of an exquisite property within itself, and bears like the flavour of the other, the element of the living soul, which is the element of animated nature.

55. As the mind exerts its power and assumes its sense of egoism, it derives the principle of the living soul from the Intellect, which with its breath of life and action, is called a living being afterwards. (The mind is what thinks, moves and acts).

56. The intellect (chit), exhibiting itself as the mind (chitta), bears the name of the purpose it has to accomplish, which being temporary and changeable, is different from the chit and a nullity. (The mind being the principle of volition, is applied also to the object of the will, as we say, I have a mind to play; which is equal to the expression, I have a playful mind: and this state of the mind being variable, is said to be null).

57. The distinction of actor and act, does not consist in the intellect, it being eternal, is neither the author or the work itself. But the living soul, which is active and productive of acts, is called the purusha or the embodied soul residing in the body-purau-sete. It is action which makes the man-purusha, from which is derived his manhood-paurusha.

58. Life with the action of the mind constitutes the mind of man. The mind taking a sensitive form, employs the organs of sense to their different functions. (The sensitivity of the mind bears an active and not the passive sense of sensitiveness or sensibility).

59. He, the radiance of the light of whose intellect, is the cause of infinite blessings to the world, is both its author and workmanship from all eternity, and there is none beside him. (He is the _Pratyagátmá_ the all-pervading soul).

60. Hence the ego or living soul is indivisible, uninflamable, unsoilable and undriable in its essence; it is everlasting and infinite (ubiquitous), and as immovable as a mountain. (The living soul is viewed in the light of the eternal soul).

61. There are many that dispute on this point, as they dispute on other matters, in their error, and mislead others into the same; but we are set free from all mistake. (The disputants are the dualists, who make a distinction between the eternal and created souls. (_Jivátmá-paramátmá-dvaita-vádis_)).

62. The dualist relying on the phenomena, is deceived by their varying appearances; but the believer in the formless unity, relies in the everlasting blessed spirit (which he views in his intellect).

63. Fondness for intellectual culture, is attended with the vernal blossoms of intellect, which are as white as the clear firmament, and as numberless as the parts of time.

64. The intellect exhibits itself in the form of the boundless and wonderful mundane egg, and it breathes out the breath of its own spirit in the same egg. (The breathing soul is called the _sútrátmá_ one of the ten hypostases of Brahma, the vital air is the first of the elementary bodies, in the order of emanation _alias_ creation).

65. It then showed itself in the wondrous form of the antimundane waters, not as they rise from springs or fall into reservoirs, as also in those of the substances constituting the bodies of the best of beings.

66. It next shone forth with its own intellectual light, which shines as bright as the humid beams of the full moon.

67. Then as the intellect rises in full light with its internal knowledge, upon disappearance of the visibles from sight; so also it is transformed to dullness by dwelling upon gross objects, when it is said to be lie dormant. In this state of the intellect, it is lowered to and confined in the earth.

68. The world is in motion by the force of the Intellect, in whose great vacuity it is settled; it is lighted by the light of that Intellect, and is therefore said to be both existent as well as inexistent by itself.

69. Like the vacuity of that Intellect, the world is said now to exist and now to be inexistent; and like the light of that Intellect, it now appears and now disappears from view.

70. Like the fleeting wind which is breathed by that Intellect, the world is now in existence and now inexistent; and like the cloudy and unclouded sphere of that Intellect, the world is now in being and now a not being.

71. Like the broad day light of that Intellect, the world is now in existence, and like the disappearance of that light, it now becomes nothing. It is formed like collyrium from the particles of the oil of the _rajas_ quality of the Intellect.

72. It is the intellectual fire that gives warmth to the world, and it is the alabaster (conch) of the intellect that causes its whiteness; the rock of intellect gives it hardness, and its water causes its fluidity.

73. The sweetness of the world, is derived from the sugar of the intellect, and its juiciness from the milk in the divine mind; its coldness is from the ice, and its heat from the fire contained in the same. (_i.e._ The divine Intellect is the material cause (_upádána káрана_) of the world).

74. The world is oily by the mustard seeds contained in the Intellect; and billowy in the sea of the divine mind. It is dulcet by the honey and aureate by the gold contained in the same.

75. The world is a fruit of the tree of Intellect, and its fragrance is derived from the flowers growing in the harbour of the mind. It is the _ens_ of the Intellect, that gives the world its entity, and it is the mould of the eternal mind, that gives its form.

76. The difference is, that this world is changeful, while the clear atmosphere of the Intellect has no change in it; and the unreal world becomes real, when it is seen as full of the Divine spirit.

77. The invariable self-sameness of the Divine spirit, makes the entity and non-entity of the world alike (because it has no existence of its own, but in the Supreme soul). And the words 'part and whole' are wholly meaningless, because both of these are full with the divine spirit.

78. Fie to them, that deride notions as false talk; because the world with its hills, and seas, earth and rivers, is all untrue without the notion of God's presence in it. (The Buddhists are perceptionalists, and have no faith in any thing beyond their sensible perceptions (_pratyaksha_); but the Vedantic spiritualists, on the contrary, are abstract conceptionalists, and believe nothing to be true, of which they have no notion or inward conception).

79. The intellect being an unity, cannot be mistaken for a part of any thing; and though it may become as solid as a stone, yet it shines brightly in the sphere of its vacuity.[13]

80. It has a clear vacuous space in its inside, as a transparent crystal, which reflects the images of all objects, though it is as clear as the sky.

81. As the lines on the leaves of trees, are neither the parts of the leaves nor distinct from them, so the world situated in the Intellect, is no part of it nor separate from it.

82. No detached soul is of heterogeneous growth, but retains in its nature the nature of the intellect, and Brahmá is the primary cause of causes. (Hence called Hiranyagarbha.)

83. The mind is of its own nature a causal principle, by reason of its notion of the Intellect; but its existence is hard to be proved, when it is insensible and unconscious of the intellect.

84. Whatever is in the root, comes out in the tree, as we see the seed shoot forth in plants of its own species.

85. All the worlds are as void as vacuity, and yet they appear otherwise, as they are situated in the Great Intellect. All this is the seat of the Supreme, and you must know it by your intellection.

86. As the Muni spake these words, the day declined to its evening twilight. The assembly broke with mutual salutations, to perform their vesperal ablutions, and met again at the court hall with the rising sunbeams, after dispersion of the nocturnal gloom.

CHAPTER XV.

STORY OF THE TEMPLE AND ITS PRINCE.

Vasishtha said:—The world is a void and as null as the pearls in the sky (seen by optical delusion). It is as unreal as the soul in the vacuity of the intellect.

2. All its objects appear, as unengraved images on the column of the mind, which is without any engraving or engraver of it.

3. As the intermotion of the waters in the sea, causes the waves to rise of themselves, so the visibles as they appear to us, are as waves in the calm spirit of the Supreme. (The variety of the waves, with the pearls, shells and froth they pour out, resemble the multiformity of worldly productions).

4. As sun-beams seen under the water, and as water appearing in the sands of the desert (mirage); so it is the fancy, that paints the world as true to us; and its bulk is like that of an atom, appearing as a hill (when seen through the microscope).

5. The fancied world is no more than a facsimile of the mind of its Maker, just as the sun beams under the water, are but reflexions of the light above; and no other than a negative notion (a false idea).

6. The ideal world is but an aerial castle, and this earth (with its contents), is as unreal as a dream, and as false as the objects of our desire.

7. The earth appearing as solid, is in the light of philosophy, no better than the liquid water of a river, in the mirage of a sandy desert, and is never in existence.

8. The illusive forms of the visibles, in this supposed substantial form of the world, resemble at least, but aerial castles and rivers in the mirage.

9. The visionary scenes of the world being taken to the scales, will be found when weighed, to be light as air and as hollow as vacuum.

10. The ignorant that are taken away by the sound of words in disregard of sense, will find when they come to sense, that there is no difference between the world and Brahma: (the one being but the reflection of the other).

11. The dull world is the issue of the Intellect, like the beams of the sun in the sky. The light of the intellect, is as light as the rarefied rays of the sun; but it raises like the other, the huge clouds, to water the shooting seeds of plants.

12. As a city in a dream, is finer than one seen in the waking state, so this visionary world is as subtile as an imaginary one.

13. Know therefore the insensible world to be the inverse of the sensible soul, and the substantive world as the reverse of the unsubstantial vacuum. The words plenum and vacuum are both as inane as airy breath, because these opposites are but different views of the same Intellect.

14. Know therefore this visible world to be no production at all; it is as nameless as it is undeveloped, and as inexistent as its seeming existence.

15. The universe is the sphere of the spirit of God in the infinite space; it has no foundation elsewhere except in that Spirit of which it is but a particle, and filling a space equal to a bit of infinity.

202970
202971 16. It is as transparent as the sky, and without any solidity at all;
202972 it is as empty as empty air, and as a city pictured in imagination.
202973

202974 17. Attend now to the story of the Temple which is pleasant to hear, 202975 and which will impress this truth deeply in your mind.
202976

202977 18. Ráma said:—Tell me at once, O Bráhman, the long and short of the 202978 story of the temple, which will help my understanding of these things.
202979

202980 19. Vasishtha said:—There lived of yore a prince on the surface of 202981 the earth, whose name was Padma from his being like the blooming and 202982 fragrant lotus of his race; and who was equally blessed with wisdom, 202983 prosperity and good children.
202984

202985 20. He observed the bounds of his duties, as the sea preserves the 202986 boundaries of countries; and destroyed the mist of his adversaries, 202987 as the sun dispels the darkness at night. He was as the moon to his 202988 lotus-like queen, and as burning fire to the hay of evils and crimes.
202989

202990 21. He was the asylum of the learned, as the mount Meru was the 202991 residence of the gods; he was the moon of fair fame risen from the 202992 ocean of the earth; and was as a lake to the geese of good qualities;
202993 and like the sun to the lotuses of purity.
202994

202995 22. He was as a blast to the creepers of his antagonists in warfare;
202996 and as a lion to the elephants of his mind (appetites). He was the 202997 favourite of all learning, and a patron of the learned, and a mine of 202998 all admirable qualities.
202999

203000 23. He stood fixed as the mount Mandara, after it had churned the ocean 203001 of the demons. He was as the vernal season to the blossoms of joy, and 203002 as the god of the floral bow to the flowers of blooming prosperity.
203003

203004 24. He was the gentle breeze to the vacillation of the playful 203005 creepers, and as the god Hari in his valour and energy. He shone as the 203006 moon on the florets of good manners, and as wildfire to the brambles of 203007 licentiousness.
203008

203009 25. His consort was the happy LÍla, playful as her name implied, and 203010 fraught with every grace, as if the goddess of prosperity, had appeared 203011 in person upon earth.
203012

203013 26. She was gentle with her submissiveness to her lord, and was sweet 203014 in her speech without art; she was always happy and slow in her 203015 movements, and ever smiling as the moon.
203016

203017 27. Her lovely lotus-white face was decorated with painted spots, and 203018 her fair form which was as fresh as a new blown bud, appeared as a 203019 moving bed of lotuses.
203020

203021 28. She was buxom as a playful plant, and bright as a branch of 203022 _kunda_ flowers, and full of glee and good humour. With her palms red 203023 as corals, and her fingers white as lilies, she was in her person a 203024 congeries of vernal beauties.
203025

203026 29. Her pure form was sacred to touch, and conferred a hilarity to the 203027 heart, as the holy stream of the Ganges, exhilarates the flock of swans 203028 floating upon it.
203029

203030 30. She was as a second Rati, born to serve her lord, who was Káma in 203031 person on earth to give joy to all souls.
203032

203033 31. She was sorry at his sorrow, and delighted to see him delightful; 203034 and was thoughtful to see him pensive. Thus was she an exact picture of 203035 her lord, except that she was afraid to find him angry.
203036
203037
203038

JOY AND GRIEF OF THE PRINCESS.

This single wived husband, enjoyed the pleasure of an undivided and unfeigned love, in company with his only consort, as with an Apsará (or heavenly nymph) on earth.

(The Apsaras are the Abisares of Ptolemy and Absairs of the Persians: a term applied to the fairy race in the watery valley of Cashmere, supposed to be the site of Paradise-Firdous, and the scene of innocent attachment).

2. The seats of their youthful sports were the gardens and groves, the arbours of shrubberies, and forests of Tamála trees. They sported also in the pleasant arbours of creepers and delightful alcoves of flowers.

3. They delighted themselves in the inner apartments, on beds decked with fragrant flowers, and on walks strewn over with fresh blossoms. They amused in their swinging cradles in their pleasure gardens in spring, and in rowing their tow-boats in summer heat.

4. Hills overgrown with sandal woods and shades of shady forests; the alcoves of Nípa and Kadamba trees, and coverts of the Páribhadra or Devadáru-cedars, were their favourite resorts in summer.

5. They sat besides the beds of kunda and Mandára plants, redolent with the fragrance of full-blown flowers; and strayed about the vernal green-woods, resounding with the melody of kokilas' notes.

6. The glossy beds of grassy tufts, the mossy seats of woods and lawns, and water-falls flooding the level lands with showers of rain (were also their favourite resorts).

7. Mountain layers overlaid with gems, minerals and richest stones; the shrines of gods and saints, holy hermitages and places of pilgrimage, were oft visited by them.

8. Lakes of full-blown lotuses and lilies, smiling Kumudas of various hues, and wood-lands darkened by green foliage, or overhung with flowers and fruitage, were their frequent haunts.

9. They passed their time in the amorous dalliances of godlike youths; and their personal beauty, was graced by the generous pastimes, of their mutual fondness and affection.

10. They amused each other with bon-mots and witticisms and solution of riddles; with story telling and playing the tricks of hold-fists mushti-bandha (purmuthi), and the various games of chess and dice.

11. They diverted themselves with the reading of dramas and narratives, and interpretation of stanzas difficult even to the learned. And sometimes they roamed about cities, towns and villages.

12. They decorated their persons with wreaths of flowers and ornaments of various kinds; fared and feasted on a variety of flavours, and moved about with playful negligence.

13. They chewed betel leaves mixed with moistened mace and camphor, and saffron; and hid the love marks on their bodies, under wreaths of flowers and corals, with which they were adorned.

14. They played the frolics of "hide and find" (Beng. lukichuri), tossing of wreaths and garlands, and swinging one another in cradles bestrewn with flowers.

15. They made their trips in pleasure-boats, and on yokes of elephants

203108 and tame camels; and sported in their pleasure-ponds by pattering water 203109 upon one another.

203111 16. They had their manly and womanly dances, the sprightly tándava
203112 and the merry lása; and songs of masculine and effeminate voices 203113 the Kalá and gíta. They had symphonious and euphonious music, and 203114 played on the lute and tabor, (the wired and percussive instruments).

203115
203116 17. They passed in their flowery conveyances through gardens and 203117 parterres, by river sides and highways, and amidst their inner 203118 apartments and royal palaces.

203119
203120 18. The loving and beloved princess being thus brought up in pleasure 203121 and indulgence, thought at one time with a wistful heart within 203122 herself:—

203123
203124 19. "How will this my lord and ruler of earth, who is in the bloom of 203125 youth and prosperity, and who is dearer to me than my life, be free
203126 from old age and death.

203128 20. "And how will I enjoy his company on beds of flowers in the palace, 203129 possessed of my youth and free-will, for the long long period of 203130 hundreds of years.

203132 21. "I will therefore endeavour with all my vigilance and prayers, and 203133 austerities and endeavours, how this moon-faced prince, may become free 203134 from death and decline.

203135
203136 22. "I will ask the most knowing, and the most austere and very learned 203137 Bráhmans, how men may evade death."

203138
203139 23. She accordingly invited the Bráhmans and honoured them with 203140 presents, and asked them lowly, to tell her how men might become 203141 immortal on earth.

203142
203143 24. The Bráhmans replied:—"Great queen! holy men may obtain success in 203144 every thing by their austerities, prayers and observance of religious 203145 rites; but no body can ever attain to immortality here below."

203146
203147 25. Hearing this from the mouths of the Bráhmans, she thought again in 203148 her own mind, and with fear for the demise of her loving lord.

203149
203150 26. "Should it happen, that I come to die before my lord, I shall then 203151 be released from all pain of separation from him, and be quite at rest 203152 in myself.

203154 27. "But if my husband happen to die before me, even after a thousand 203155 years of our lives, I shall so manage it, that his soul (the immortal 203156 part of his body), may not depart from the confines of this mansion 203157 (the charnel-house).

203158
203159 28. "So that the spirit of my lord, will rove about the holy vault in 203160 the inner apartment, and I shall feel the satisfaction of moving about 203161 in his presence at all times."

203163 29. "I will commence even from this day, to worship Sarasvatí—the 203164 goddess of Intelligence, and offer my prayers to her for this purpose, 203165 with observance of fasts and other rites to my heart's content."

203166
203167 30. Having determined so, she betook herself to observe the strict 203168 ceremonials of the Sástra, and without the knowledge of her lord.

203169
203170 31. She kept her fasts, and broke them at the end of every third night;
203171 and then entertained the gods, Bráhmans, the priests and holy people, 203172 with feasts and due honours.

203174 32. She was then employed in the performance of her daily ablutions, 203175 in her act of alms-giving, in the observance of her austerities and in 203176 meditation; in all of which she was painstaking, an observant of the 203177 rules of pious theism.

203179 33. She attended also to her incognizant husband at stated times, and 203180 ministered unto him to the utmost, her duties as required by law and 203181 usage.

203182
203183 34. Thus observant of her vows, the young princess passed a hundred of 203184 her trinoctial ceremony, with resolute and persevering pains-taking and 203185 unfailing austerities.

203187 35. The fair goddess of speech, was pleased at the completion of her 203188 hundredth trinoctial observance, in which she was honoured by her, with 203189 all outward and spiritual complaisance, and then bespoke to her.

203191 36. Sarasvatí said:—"I am pleased my child! with thy continued
203192 devotion to me, and thy constant devotedness to thy husband. Now ask 203193 the boon that thou wouldst have of me."

203194
203195 37. The princess replied:—"Be victorious, O moon-bright goddess!
203196 that puttest to an end all the pains of our birth and death, and the 203197 troubles, afflictions and evils of this world; and that like the sun, 203198 puttest to flight the darkness of our affections and afflictions in 203199 this life.

203201 38. "Save me O goddess, and thou parent of the world, and have pity 203202 on this wretched devotee, and grant her these two boons, that she 203203 supplicates of thee.

203204
203205 39. "The one is, that after my husband is dead, his soul may not go 203206 beyond the precincts of this shrine in the inner apartment.

203208 40. "The second is, that thou shalt hear my prayer, and appear before 203209 me, whenever I raise my voice to thee, for having thy sight and 203210 blessing."

203211
203212 41. Hearing this, the goddess said, "Be it so;" and immediately 203213 disappeared in the air (whence she came); as the wave subsides in the 203214 sea whence it rises to view.

203215
203216 42. The princess being blessed by the presence and good grace of the 203217 goddess, was as delighted as a doe at the hearing of music.

203218
203219 43. The wheel of time rolled on its two semicircles of the fort-nights.
203220 The spikes of months, the arcs of the seasons, the loops of days and 203221 nights and the orbit of years. The axle composed of fleeting moments;
203222 giving incessant momentum to the wheel.

203223
203224 44. The perceptions of the prince, entered into the inner man within 203225 the body (_lingadeha_); and he looked in a short time, as dry as a 203226 withered leaf without its juicy gloss.

203228 45. The dead body of the warlike prince, being laid over the sepulchre, 203229 in the inside of the palace, the princess began to fade away at its 203230 sight, like a lotus flower without its natal water (of the lake).

203231
203232 46. Her lips grew pale by her hot and poisoned breath of sorrow; and 203233 she was in the agony of death, as a doe pierced by a dart (in her 203234 mortal part).

203235
203236 47. Her eyes were covered in darkness at the death of her lord, as a 203237 house becomes dark at the extinction of the light of its lamp.

203238
203239 48. She became leaner every moment, in her sad melancholy; and turned 203240 as a dried channel covered with dirt in lieu of its water.

203241
203242 49. She moved one moment and was then mute as a statue; she was about 203243 to die of grief, as the ruddy goose at the separation of her mate.

203245 50. Then the etherial goddess Sarasvatí, took pity on the excess of her grief, and showed as much compassion for her relief, as the first shower of rain, does to the dying fishes in a drying pond.

CHAPTER XVII.

STORY OF THE DOUBTFUL REALM OR REVERIE OF LÍLÁ.

Sarasvatí said:—Remove my child, the dead body of thy husband to yonder shrine! and strew those flowers over it, and thou shalt have thy husband again.

2. Never will this body rot or fade as long as the flowers are fresh over it, and know thy husband will shortly return to life again. (The strewing of flowers over the dead body and the grave, is a practice common in many religions).

3. His living soul which is as pure as air, will never depart from this cemetery of thy inner apartment. (The departed soul is believed to hover about the crypt or cairn until the day of resurrection).

4. The black-eyed princess, with her eyebrows resembling a cluster of black-bees, heard this consolatory speech of the goddess, and was cheered in her spirit, as the lotus-bed on return of the rains.

5. She placed the corpse of her husband there, and hid it under the flowers, and remained in expectation of its rising, as a poor man fosters the hope of finding a treasure.

6. It was at midnight of the very day, when all the members of the family had fallen fast asleep, that Lílá repaired to the shrine in the inward apartment.

7. There she meditated on the goddess of knowledge, in the recess of her understanding, and called her in earnest in the sorrow of her heart, when she heard the divine voice thus addressing to her.

8. "Why dost thou call me, child, and why art thou so sorrowful in thy countenance? The world is full of errors, glaring as false water in a mirage."

9. Lílá answered:—"Tell me goddess, where my husband resides at present, and what he has been doing now. Take me to his presence, as I am unable to bear the load of my life without him."

10. The goddess replied:—"His spirit is now roving in the sky, of which there are three kinds:—one the firmament or region of the sensible worlds; the other is the region of the mind, the seat of volition and creation; and third is the region of Intellect, which contains the two others.

11. "Your husband's soul is now in the sheath of the region of Intellect (being withdrawn both from the regions of the visible world and sensuous mind). It is now by seeking in the region of the Intellect, that things which are inexistent here, are to be found there.

12. "As in passing from one place to another, you are conscious of standing in the mid spot (which is neither the one nor the other); so you will arrive in an instant at the intermediate region of the intellectual world (lying between this sensible and spiritual worlds).

13. "If you will abide in that intellectual world, after forsaking all your mental desires, you will certainly come to the knowledge of that spiritual Being who comprehends all in himself.

14. "It is only by your knowledge of the negative existence of the world, that you can come to know the positive existence of that Being, as you will now be able to do by my grace, and by no other means whatever." (Forget the sensible to get to the Spiritual. Hafiz).

15. Vasishtha said:—so saying, the goddess repaired to her heavenly seat; and Lílá sat gladly in her mood of steadfast meditation. (Platonism).

16. She quitted in a moment the prison house of her body, and her soul broke out of its inner bound of the mind, to fly freely in the air, like a bird freed from its cage: (so Plato compares the flight of the parting soul with that of a bird from its cage).

17. She ascended to the airy region of the Intellect, and saw (by her intellectual light) her husband seated there in his seat, amidst a group of princes and rulers of the earth (who had received various forms and states according to their acts and desires).

18. He was seated on a throne, and lauded with the loud acclamations of "Long live the king," and "Be he victorious." His officers were prompt in the discharge of their several duties.

19. The royal palace and hall were decorated with rows of flags, and there was an assemblage of unnumbered sages and saints, Bráhmans and Rishis at the eastern entrance of the hall.

20. There stood a levy of innumerable princes and chiefs of men at the southern porch, and a bevy of young ladies standing at the western door-way.

21. The northern gateway was blocked by lines of horse, carriages and elephants; when a guard advanced and informed the king of a warfare in Deccan.

22. He said that the chief of Karnatic, has made an attack on the eastern frontier; and that the chieftain of Surat, has brought to subjection the barbarous tribes on the north; and that the ruler of Malwa, has besieged the city of Tonkan on the west.

23. Then there was the reception of the ambassador from Lanká, coming from the coast of the southern sea.

24. There appeared next the Siddhas, coming from the Mahendra mountains bordering the eastern main, and traversing the numerous rivers of their fluvial districts; as also the ambassador of the Guhyaka or Yaksha tribes, inhabiting the shores of the northern sea.

25. There were likewise the envoys, visiting the shores of the western main, and relating the state of affairs of that territory to the king. The whole courtyard was filled with lustre by the assemblage of unnumbered chieftains from all quarters.

26. The recitals of Bráhmans on sacrificial altars, died away under the sound of the timbrels; and the loud shouts of panegyrists, were re-echoed by the uproar of elephants.

27. The vault of heaven, resounding to the sound of the vocal and instrumental music; and the dust raised by the procession of elephants and chariots, and the trotting of horses' hoofs, obscured the face of the sky as by a cloud.

28. The air was perfumed by the fragrance of flowers, camphor and heaps of frankincense; and the royal hall was filled with presents sent from different provinces.

29. His fair fame shone forth as a burning hill of white camphor, and raised a column of splendour reaching to the sky, and casting into shade the solar light.

203384 30. There were the rulers of districts, who were busily employed 203385 in their grave and momentous duties, and the great architects who 203386 conducted the building of many cities.
203387
203388 31. Then the ardent Lílá entered the court-hall of the ruler of men, 203389 and unseen by any, just as one void mixes with another void, and as air
203390 is lost in the air.
203391
203392 32. She wandered about without being seen by any body there; just as a 203393 fair figure, formed by false imagination of our fond desire, is not to 203394 be perceived by any one without ourselves.
203395
203396 33. In this manner she continued to walk about the palace unperceived 203397 by all, as the aerial castle built in one's mind, is not perceived by 203398 another.
203399
203400 34. She beheld them all assembled in the royal court in their former 203401 forms, and saw all the cities of the princes, as concentrated in that 203402 single city of her lord's.
203403
203404 35. She viewed the same places, the same dealings, the same concourse 203405 of boys, and the same sorts of men and women, and the same ministers as 203406 before.
203407
203408 36. She saw the same rulers of earth, and the very same Pandits as 203409 before; the identic courtiers and the self-same servants as ever.
203410
203411 37. There was the same assemblage of the learned men and friends as 203412 before, and the like throng of citizens pursuing their former course of 203413 business.
203414
203415 38. She saw on a sudden, the flames of wild fire spreading on all sides 203416 even in broad midday light; and the sun and moon appearing both at 203417 once in the sky, and the clouds roaring with a tremendous noise, with 203418 the whistling of the winds.
203419
203420 39. She saw the trees, the hills, the rivers and the cities flourishing 203421 with population; and the many towns, and villages and forests all about.
203422
203423 40. She beheld her royal consort as a boy of ten years of age after 203424 shaking off his former frame of old age, sitting amidst the hall with 203425 all his former retinue, and all the inhabitants of his village.
203426

203427 SECTION I.

203428 DESCRIPTION OF THE COURT HOUSE AND THE CORTES.

203429
203430
203431
203432 41. Lílá having seen all these began to reflect within herself, whether 203433 the inhabitants of this place were living beings or the ghosts of their 203434 former living souls.
203435
203436 42. Then having recovered her sense at the removal of her trance, she 203437 entered into her inner apartment at midnight, and found the inmates 203438 fast bound in sleep.
203439
203440 43. She raised one by one her sleeping companions, and said she was 203441 anxious to visit the royal hall.
203442
203443 44. She wanted to be seated beside the throne of her lord, and to clear 203444 her doubt by seeing the courtiers all alive.
203445
203446 45. The royal menials rose up at her call, and obedient to her command
203447 they said "Be it so," and attended to their respective duties.
203448
203449 46. A train of club-bearers ran to all sides to call the courtiers from 203450 the city, and sweepers came and swept the ground as clean as the sun
203451 had shed his rays upon it.
203452

203453 47. A better set of servants cleansed the court-yard as clean, as 203454 autumn days clear the firmament of its rainy clouds.
203455
203456 48. Rows of lights were placed about the court-yard, which looked as 203457 beautiful as clusters of stars in the clear sky.
203458
203459 49. The ground of the court-yard was filled by throngs of people, as 203460 the earth was covered of yore by floods of the great deluge.
203461
203462 50. The dignified ministers and chiefs attended first and took their 203463 respective seats, and appeared as a set of the newly created rulers of 203464 people of the world on all sides, or the regents of the quarters of the 203465 sky.
203466
203467 51. The cooling and fragrant odour of thickly pasted camphor filled the 203468 palace, and the sweet-scented zephyrs breathed profusely the fragrance
203469 of the lotus flowers, which they bore from all sides.
203470
203471 52. The chamberlains stood all around in their white garbs, and 203472 appeared as an assemblage of silvery clouds, hanging over the burning 203473 hills under the equator.
203474
203475 53. The ground was strewn over by the morning breeze with heaps of 203476 flowers, bright as the beaming dawn dispelling the gloom of night, and 203477 etiolated as clusters of stars fallen upon the ground.
203478
203479 54. The palace was crowded by the retinue of the chiefs of the land,
203480 and seemed as it was a lake full of full-blown lotuses, with the fair
203481 swimming swans rambling about them.
203482
203483 55. There Lílá took her seat on a golden seat by the side of the 203484 throne, and appeared as the beauteous Rati seated in the joyous heart
203485 of Káma (_i.e._ as Venus sitting in the lap of aureate lighted Phoebus).
203486
203487 56. She saw all the princes seated in their order as before, and the 203488 elders of the people and the nobles of men and all her friends and 203489 relatives, seated in their proper places.
203490
203491 57. She was highly delighted to behold them all in their former states, 203492 and shone forth as the moon with the brightness of her countenance, to 203493 find them all alive again.
203494
203495
203496
203497
203498
203499

203500 CHAPTER XVIII.

203501 EXPOSURE OF THE ERRORS OF THIS WORLD.

203503 She said, "I have much consolation in you, and now will I console my 203504 sorrowing heart." So saying, she made a sign for the assembly to break, 203505 and rose from her royal seat.
203506

203507 2. She entered the inner apartment and sat by the side of the dead 203508 body of her lord, hidden under the heap of flowers, and thus began to 203509 reflect within herself.
203510

203511 3. She exclaimed:—"O the wondrous magic! that presents these people of 203512 my place situated in the same manner without myself, as they were seen 203513 to be seated within me.
203514

203515 4. "O how great is the extent of this delusion, as to contain the same 203516 high hills, and the same spacious forests of palm and Hintála trees, 203517 both in the outside as well as they are situated in the inside of 203518 myself.
203519

203520 5. "As the mirror shows the reflexion of the hills within itself as 203521 they are without it, so the reflector of the intellect presents the whole creation inwardly as it has outwards of itself.

6. "I must now invoke the goddess of wisdom to ascertain which of these is illusion, and which the sober and certain reality."

7. So saying, she worshipped and invoked the goddess, and beheld her immediately present before herself, in the form of a virgin.

8. She made the goddess sit on the elevated seat, and having seated herself low upon the ground before her, asked that divine power to tell her the truth.

9. Lílá said:—"Vouchsafe, O goddess, and clear this doubt of thy suppliant; for it is thy wisdom which has framed this beautiful system of the universe at first and knows the truth. (Divine wisdom is the prime cause of all).

10. "Tell me, O great goddess, about what I am going to lay before thee at present, for it is by thy favour alone that I may be successful to know it.

11. "I saw the pattern of this world in the intellect, which is more transparent than the etherial sphere, and as extensive as to contain millions and millions of miles in a small space of it.

12. "It is what no definite words can express, and what is known as the calm, cool and ineffable light. This is called the unintelligible intelligence, and is without any cover or support (_nirávarana nirbhitti_).

13. "It exhibits the reflexions of space and the course of time, and those of the sky and its light, and the course of events concentrating in itself.

14. "Thus the images of the worlds, are to be seen both within and without the intellect, and it is hard to distinguish the real and unreal ones between them."

15. The goddess asked:—Tell me fair lady, what is the nature of the real world, and what you mean, by its unreality.

16. Lílá replied:—I know the nature of the real to be such as I find myself to be sitting here, and looking upon you as seated in this place.

17. And I mean that to be unreal, as the state in which I beheld my husband in the etherial region erewhile; because vacuity has no limit of time or place in it.

18. The goddess rejoined:—The real creation cannot produce an unreal figure, nor a similar cause produce a dissimilar effect.

19. Lílá replied:—But we often see, O goddess! dissimilar effects to be produced from similar causes: thus, the earth and earthen pot though similar in their substance, yet the one is seen to melt in water, and the other to carry water in it.

20. The goddess said:—Yes, when an act is done by the aid of auxiliary means, there the effect is found to be somewhat different from the primary cause. (Thus the earthen pot being produced by the auxiliary appliances of fire, the potter's wheel and the like, differs in its quality from the original clay).

21. Say O beauteous lady! what were the causes of thy husband's being born in this earth? The same led to his birth in the other world also (_i.e._ the merit of the acts and desires of men, are the causes of their transmigrations in both worlds).

22. When the soul has fled from here, how can the earth follow him there any more, and what auxiliary causes can there be in connection 203591 with this cause?

203593 23. Wherever there arises a coaction with its apparent causality, it 203594 is usually attributed by every one to some unknown antecedent cause or 203595 motive.

203596
203597 24. Lílá said:—Methinks goddess, that it was the expansion of my 203598 husband's memory that was the cause of his regenerations; because it is 203599 certain that reminiscence is the cause of the reproduction of objects 203600 before us.

203602 25. The goddess replied that, memory is an aerial substance, and its 203603 productions are as unsubstantial as itself.

203604
203605 26. Lílá said:—Yes I find reminiscence to be an airy thing, and its 203606 reproduction of my husband and all other things within me to be but 203607 empty shadows in the mind.

203608
203609 27. The goddess replied:—So verily was this reproduction of thy 203610 husband and all those things which appeared to thy sight in thy 203611 reverie; and so, my daughter, is the appearance of all things I see in 203612 this world.

203613
203614 28. Lílá said:—Tell me goddess for the removal of my conception of the 203615 reality of the world, how the false appearance of my formless lord, was 203616 produced before me by the unreal world, (since nothing unsubstantial 203617 can cast a shadow).

203618
203619 29. The goddess replied:—As this illusive world appeared a reality to 203620 thee before thy reminiscence of it, so must thou know all this to be 203621 unreal from what I am going to relate to thee.

203622
203623 30. There is in some part of the sphere of the Intellect the great 203624 fabric of the world, with the glassy vault of the firmament for its 203625 roof on all sides.

203626
203627 31. The Meru (the polar axle or mountain) is its pillar, beset 203628 around by the regents of the ten sides, as statues carved upon it.
203629 The fourteen regions are as so many apartments of it, and the hollow 203630 concavity containing the three worlds, is lighted by the lamp of the 203631 luminous sun.

203632
203633 32. Its corners are inhabited by living creatures resembling ants and 203634 emmets, which are surrounded by mountains appearing as ant-hills in the 203635 sight of Brahmá, the prime lord of creatures and the primeval patriarch 203636 of many races of men.

203637
203638 33. All animal beings are as worms confined in the cocoons (prison 203639 houses) of their own making. The azure skies above and below are as the 203640 soot of this house, beset by bodies of Siddhas (or departed spirits), 203641 resembling groups of gnats buzzing in the air.

203642
203643 34. The fleeting clouds are the smoke of this house or as webs of 203644 spiders in its corners, and the hollow air is full of aerial spirits, 203645 like holes of bamboos filled with flies.

203646
203647 35. There are also the playful spirits of gods and demigods, hovering 203648 over human habitations, as swarms of busy and buzzing bees about 203649 vessels of honey.

203651 36. Here there lay amidst the cavity of heaven, earth and the infernal 203652 regions, tracts of land well watered by rivers, lakes and the sea on 203653 all sides.

203655 37. In a corner of this land, there was situated a secluded piece of 203656 ground (a vale or village), sheltered by hills and craigs about it.

203657
203658 38. In this secluded spot thus sheltered by hills, rivers and forests,
203659 there lived a Bráhma with his wife and children, free from disease

203660 and care of gain and fear of a ruler, and passed his days in his 203661 fire-worship and hospitality, with the produce of his kine and lands.

203666 CHAPTER XIX.

203667 STORY OF A FORMER VASISHTHA AND HIS WIFE. 203668 203669 203670

203671 This Bráhmaṇ was equal to his namesake—the sage Vasishtha, in his age 203672 and attire, in his learning and wealth, and in all his actions and 203673 pursuits, except in his profession. (The one being a secular man, and 203674 the other the priest of the royal family).
203675

203676 2. His name was Vasishtha, and that of his wife Arundhatī; who was as 203677 fair as the moon, and as the star of the same name on earth.
203678

203679 3. She resembled her namesake the priestess of the solar race, in her 203680 virtues and parts and in all things, except in her soul and body.
203681

203682 4. She passed her time in true love and affection in his company, and 203683 was his all in the world, with her sweet smiling face resembling the 203684 Kumuda flower.
203685

203686 5. This Bráhmaṇ had been sitting once under the shady sarala trees, 203687 on the table land of his native hill, when he saw the ruler of the 203688 land, passing with his gaudy train below.
203689

203690 6. He was accompanied by all the members of the royal family and his 203691 troops and soldiers, and was going to a chase, with a clamour that 203692 resounded in the hills and forests.
203693

203694 7. The white flappers shed a stream of moon light, and the lifted 203695 banners appeared as a moving forest, and the white umbrellas made the 203696 sky a canopy to them.
203697

203698 8. The air was filled with dust raised by the hoofs of horses from the 203699 ground, and lines of elephants with their high haúdás, seemed as 203700 moving towers, to protect them from the solar heat and sultry winds.
203701

203702 9. The wild animals were running on all sides at the loud uproar of the 203703 party, resembling the roaring of a whirlpool, and shining gems and 203704 jewels were flashing all about on the persons of the party.
203705

203706 10. The Bráhmaṇ saw the procession and said to himself, "O how charming 203707 is royalty, which is fraught with such splendour and prosperity."
203708

203709 11. Ah! how shall I become the monarch of all the ten sides, and have 203710 such a retinue of horse and elephants and foot soldiers, with a similar 203711 train of flags and flappers and blazing umbrellas.
203712

203713 12. When will the breeze waft the fragrance of kunda flowers, and 203714 the farina of lotuses to my bed-chamber, to lull me and my consorts to 203715 sleep.
203716

203717 13. When shall I adorn the countenances of my chamber maids with 203718 camphor and sandal paste, and enlighten the faces of the four quarters
203719 with my fair fame, as the moon-beams decorate the night.
203720

203721 14. With these thoughts, the Bráhmaṇ was thenceforth determined to 203722 apply himself with vigilance, to the rigid austerities of his religion
203723 for life.
203724

203725 15. He was at last overtaken by infirmities which shattered his frame, 203726 as the sleets of snowfall, batter the blooming lotuses in the lake.
203727

203728 16. Seeing his approaching death, his faithful wife was fading away

203729 with fear, as a creeper withers at the departure of spring, for fear of 203730 the summer heat.

203731
203732 17. This lady then began to worship me (the personification of Wisdom)
203733 like thyself, for obtaining the boon of immortality which is hard to be 203734 had.

203735
203736 18. She prayed saying:—Ordain, O goddess! that the spirit of my lord
203737 may not depart from this sepulchre after his demise: and I granted her 203738 request.

203739
203740 19. After sometime the Bráhmaṇ died, and his vacuous spirit remained in 203741 the vacuity of that abode.

203742
203743 20. This aeriform spirit of the Bráhmaṇ, assumed the shape of a mighty 203744 man on earth, by virtue of the excessive desire and merit of acts in 203745 his former state of existence.

203746
203747 21. He became the victorious monarch of the three realms, by 203748 subjugating the surface of the earth by his might, by laying hold on 203749 the high steep (of the gods) by his valour, and his kind protection of 203750 the nether lands (watery regions) under his sway.

203752 22. He was as a conflagration to the forest of his enemies, and as the 203753 steadfast Meru amidst the rushing winds of business on all sides. He 203754 was as the sun expanding the lotus-like hearts of the virtuous, and as 203755 the god of the _makara_ ensign (Kama or Cupid) to the eyes of women.

203756
203757 23. He was the model of all learning, and the all giving _Kalpa_ tree 203758 to his suitors; he was the footstool of great Pandits, and as the 203759 full-moon shedding the ambrosial beams of polity all around.

203760
203761 24. But after the Bráhmaṇ was dead, and his dead body had disappeared 203762 in the forms of elementary particles in air, and his airy spirit had 203763 reposed in the aerial intellectual soul within the empty space of his 203764 house.

203765
203766 25. His Bráhmaṇic widow (born of the priestly class), was pining away 203767 in her sorrow, and her heart was rent in twain as the dried pod of 203768 _Simbi_.

203769
203770 26. She became a dead body like her husband, and her spirit by 203771 shuffling off its mortal coil, resumed its subtile and immortal form, 203772 in which it met the departed ghost of her husband.

203773
203774 27. She advanced to her lord, as rapidly as a river runs to meet the 203775 sea below its level; and became as cheerful to join him, as a cluster 203776 of flowers to inhale the vernal air.

203777
203778 28. The houses, lands and all the immovable properties and movable 203779 riches of this Bráhmaṇ, are still existent in that rocky village, and 203780 it is only eight days past, that the souls of this loving pair, are 203781 reunited in the hollow vault of their house.

203782 203783 203784 203785 203786 CHAPTER XX.

203787 203788 THE MORAL OF THE TALE OF LÍLÁ.

203790
203791 The goddess said:—That Bráhmaṇ whom I said before, had become a 203792 monarch on earth, is the same with thy husband, and his wife Arundhati, 203793 is no other than thyself—the best of women.

203794
203795 2. You two are the same pair now reigning over this realm, and 203796 resembling a pair of doves in your nuptial love, and the deities Siva
203797 and Párvati in your might.

3. I have thus related to you the state of your past lives, that you may know the living soul to be but air, and the knowledge of its reality is but an error.
4. The erroneous knowledge (derived from sense), casts its reflection in the intellect, and causes its error also (errors in the senses breed errors in the mind); and this makes you doubtful of the truth and untruth of the two states (of the sensible and intellectual worlds).
5. Therefore the question, 'which is true and which is untrue,' has no better solution than that all creations (whether visible or invisible, mental or ideal), are equally false and unsubstantial.
6. Vasishtha said:—Hearing these words of the goddess, Lílá was confused in her mind, and with her eyes staring with wonder, she addressed her softly.
7. Lílá said:—How is it, O goddess! that your words are so incoherent with truth, you make us the same, with the Brahmanic pair, who are in their own house, and we are sitting here in our palace.
8. And how is it possible that the small space of the room in which my husband's body is lying, could contain those spacious lands and hills and the ten sides of the sky: (as I already saw in my trance—_Samádhi_).
9. It is as impossible as to confine an elephant in a mustard seed, and as the fighting of a gnat with a body of lions in a nut-shell.
10. It is as incredible as to believe a lotus seed containing a hill in it, and to be devoured by a little bee; or that the peacocks are dancing on hearing the roaring of clouds in a dream.
11. It is equally inconsistent to say, O great goddess of gods! that this earth with all its mountains and other things, are contained within the small space of a sleeping room.
12. Deign therefore, O goddess to explain this mystery clearly unto me; because it is by thy favour only that the learned are cleared of their doubts.
13. The goddess said:—Hear me fair lady! I do not tell thee a lie; because transgression of the law is a thing unknown to us. (The law is _nánritam vadeta_—never tell an untruth).
14. It is I that establish the law when others are about to break it; if then I should slight the same, who else is there who would observe it.
15. The living soul of the village Bráhmaṇ, saw within itself and in the very house, the image of this great kingdom, as his departed spirit now views the same in its empty vacuity. (Therefore both these states are equally ideal).
16. But you have lost the remembrance of the states of your former lives after death, as they lose the recollection of waking events in the dreaming state.
17. As the appearance of the three worlds in dream, and their formation in the imagination; or as the description of a warfare in an epic poem and water in the mirage of a _maru_ or sandy desert (are all false):
18. So were the hills and habitations which were seen in the empty space of the Bráhmaṇ's house, which was no other than the capacity of his own mind to form the images of its fancy, and receive the external impressions like a reflecting mirror (all mere ideal).
19. All these though unreal, yet they appear as real substances on

203867 account of the reality of the intellect, which is seated in the cavity
203868 of the inmost sheath of the body and reflects the images.

203869
203870 20. But these images, which are derived from the remembrance of unreal 203871 objects of the world, are as unreal as those objects which cast their 203872 reflexions in the intellect; just as the waves rising in the river of a 203873 mirage, are as unreal as the mirage itself.

203874
203875 21. Know this seat (sadana) of yours, which is set in this closet
203876 (_kosha_) of the house, as well as myself and thyself and all things 203877 about us, to be but the reflections of our intellect only, without 203878 which nothing would be perceptible, as to one who is devoid of his 203879 intellect.

203881 22. Our dreams and fallacies, our desires and fancies, as also our 203882 notions and ideas, serve as the best evidences, that afford us their 203883 light for the understanding of this truth: (that nothing is true beside 203884 the subjective mind, which creates and forms, produces and presents all 203885 objects to our view).

203887 23. The spirit of the Bráhmaṇ resided in the vacuity of his house 203888 (the body), with the seas and forests and the earth (_i.e._ their 203889 impressions) within itself, as the bee abides in the lotus.

203890
203891 24. Thus the habitable globe with every thing it contains, is situated 203892 in a small cell in one corner of the intellect, as a spot of flimsy
203893 cloud in the firmament.

203894
203895 25. The House of the Bráhmaṇ was situated in the same locality of the 203896 intellect, which contains all the worlds in one of its atomic particles.

203897
203898 26. The intelligent soul contains in every atom of it, unnumbered
203899 worlds within worlds, enough to remove your doubt; of the Bráhmaṇ's 203900 viewing a whole realm within the space of his intellect.

203901
203902 27. Lílá asked:—How can the Bráhmaṇic pair be ourselves, when they are 203903 dead only eight days before, and we have been reigning here for so many 203904 years?

203906 28. The goddess replied:—There is neither any limit of space or 203907 duration, nor any distance of place or length of time in reality: hear 203908 me now tell you the reason of it.

203909
203910 29. As the universe is the reflexion of the divine mind, so are 203911 infinity and eternity but representations of himself.

203912
203913 30. Attend to what I tell you about the manner in which we form the 203914 idea of time, and its distinct parts of a moment and an age, in the 203915 same way as we make the distinction of individualities in me, thee and 203916 this or that person (which are essentially the same undivided spirit 203917 and duration).[14]

203918 203919 203920 SECTION II.

203921 203922 _State of the Human soul after death._

203923
203924 31. Hear now, that no sooner does any one come to feel the 203925 insensibility consequent to his death, than he forgets his former 203926 nature and thinks himself as another being.

203927
203928 32. He then assumes an empty form in the womb of vacuity in the 203929 twinkling of an eye, and being contained in that container, he thinks 203930 within himself in the same receptacle.

203931
203932 33. "This is my body with its hands and feet." Thus the body he thinks 203933 upon, he finds the same presented before him.

203935 34. He then thinks in himself: "I am the son of this father and am so many years old; these are my dear friends and this is my pleasant abode."

35. "I was born and became a boy, and then grew up to this age. There are all my friends and in the same course of their lives."

36. Thus the compact density of the sphere of his soul, presents him many other figures, which appear to rise in it as in some part of the world.

37. But they neither rise nor remain in the soul itself, which is as transparent as the empty air; they appear to the intellect as a vision seen in a dream.

38. As the view beheld in a dream, presents the sights of all things in one place, so does every thing appear to the eye of the beholder of the other world as in his dream.

39. Again whatever is seen in the other world, the same occurs to men in their present states also; wherefore the reality of this and unreality of the other world, are both alike to a state of dreaming.

40. And as there is no difference in the waves of the same sea-water, so the produced visible creation is no other than the unproduced intellectual world, both of which are equally indestructible: (the one being but a copy of the other).

41. But in reality the appearance is nothing but a reflection of the intellect; and which apart from the intelligible spirit, is merely an empty vacuity.

42. The creation though presided by the intelligible spirit, is itself a mere void, its intelligible soul being the only substance of it as the water of the waves.

43. The waves though formed of water, are themselves as false as the horns of hares; and their appearance as natural objects: is altogether false (because they are the effects of the auxiliary cause of the winds which have raised them).

44. Hence there being no visible object in reality (except a false appearance of such), how can the observer have any idea of the visible, which loses its delusion at the moment of his death.

45. After disappearance of the visible outer world from sight, the soul reflects on its reminiscence of the creation in its inner world of the mind, according to the proper time and place of every thing.

46. It remembers its birth, its parents, its age and its residence, with its learning and all other pursuits in their exact manner and order.

47. It thinks of its friends and servants, and of the success and failure of its attempts. And thus the increate and incorporeal soul, ruminates on the events of its created and corporeal state in its intellectual form.

48. It does not however remain long in this state, but enters a new body soon after its death, to which the properties of the mind and senses, are added afterwards in their proper times.

49. It then becomes a baby, and finds a new father and mother, and begins to grow. Thus whether one may perceive it or not, it is all the product of his former reminiscence.

50. Then upon waking from this state of trance, like a fruit from the cell of a flower, it comes to find that a single moment appeared to it as the period of an age.

204005 51. So King Harish Chandra of yore thought one night as a period of 204006 twelve years; and so one day seems as long as a year to them that are 204007 separated from their beloved objects.
204008

204009 52. Again as the birth or death of one in his dream, or his getting a 204010 begotten father in infancy, or a hungry man's faring on dainty food in 204011 thought, is all false:
204012

204013 53. So when a sated man says he is starving, or one declares he is an 204014 eye witness of a thing he has not seen, or an empty space is full of 204015 people, or that he has got a lost treasure in his dream, who is there 204016 to believe him?
204017

204018 54. But this visible world rests in the invisible spirit of God, as the 204019 property of pungency, resides in the particles, of the pepper seed, and 204020 as the painted pictures on a column. But where are the open and clear 204021 sighted eyes to perceive the same?
204022

204023 204024 INTERPRETATION OF LÍLÁ'S VISION. 204025

204026 55. The vision of Lílá, called samádhi in Yoga and _clairvoyance_ of 204027 spiritualism, was the abstract meditation of her lord in her memory.
204028 Which presented her with a full view of every thing imprinted in it.
204029 The memory is taken for the whole intellect _chit_, which is identified 204030 with God, in whose essence the images of all things, are said to be 204031 eternally present.
204032
204033
204034
204035

204036 204037 CHAPTER XXI. 204038

204039 204040 GUIDE TO PEACE.

204041 Soon after the insensibility occasioned by one's death is over, there 204042 appears to him (soul) the sight of the world, as he viewed it with his 204043 open eyes when he was living.
204044

204045 2. It presents before him the circle of the sky and its sides with the 204046 cycle of its seasons and times, and shows him the deeds of his pious 204047 and secular acts, as they were to continue to eternity.
204048

204049 3. Objects never seen nor thought of before, also offer themselves to 204050 his view, as the sight of his own death in a dream, and as they were 204051 the prints in his memory.
204052

204053 4. But the infinity of objects, appearing in the empty sphere of the 204054 immaterial intellect, is mere illusion, and the baseless city of the 204055 world, like an aerial castle, is but the creation of imagination.
204056

204057 5. It is the remembrance of the past world, that makes it known to us 204058 (because it is impossible to recognise any thing without a previous 204059 impression of its kind in the mind). Hence the length of a _kalpa_ age
204060 and the shortness of a moment, are but erroneous impressions proceeding 204061 from the rapidity and slowness of our thoughts.
204062

204063 6. Therefore knowledge, based upon previous notions or otherwise, is 204064 of two kinds, and things known without their cause, are attributed to 204065 Divine Intelligence (as the hidden cause of all).
204066

204067 7. We are conscious also of thoughts, unthought of before in our minds, 204068 as we often have in our dreams; and think of our parents after their 204069 demise by mistake of other persons as such.
204070

204071 8. Sometimes genius supercedes the province of memory, as in the first 204072 creation or discovery of a thing, which is afterwards continued by its 204073 remembrance.

204074
204075 9. According to some, those visible worlds are said to have remained 204076 in their ideal state in the Divine mind; and according to others, that 204077 there were no pre-existent notions of these in the mind of God.
204078

204079 10. According to some others, the world manifested itself not from the 204080 memory, but by the power and will of God; while others maintain it to 204081 be the production of a fortuitous combination, of intelligence and 204082 atomic principles on a sudden (_Kákatáliya sanyoga_).
204083

204084 11. It is the entire forgetfulness of the world, which is styled 204085 liberation, and which can not be had from attachment to what is 204086 desirable or aversion of the undesirable.
204087

204088 12. It is difficult to effect an entire negation, both of one's 204089 subjective as well as objective knowledge of his self, and the 204090 existence of the outer world; and yet no body can be freed without 204091 obliteration of both.
204092

204093 13. As the fallacy of taking a rope for a snake, is not removed until 204094 the meaning of the world snake, is known to be inapplicable to the 204095 rope; so no one can have rest and peace of his mind, unless he is 204096 convinced of the illusive nature of the world.
204097

204098 14. One party, who is at peace with himself (by his abandonment of the 204099 world), can not be wholly at rest without divine knowledge; as the 204100 ghost of his inward ignorance, may overtake him after his getting rid 204101 of the devil of worldliness.
204102

204103 15. The world is certainly a monster in itself without the knowledge of 204104 its Author; but the difficulty of knowing the first cause, has rendered 204105 it an impassable wilderness.
204106

204107 16. Lílá said:—If reminiscence be the cause of one's reproduction, 204108 then say, O goddess! what were the causes of the birth of the Bráhmanic
204109 pair, without the vestiges of their past remembrance.
204110

204111 17. The goddess replied:—Know that Brahmá the first progenitor of 204112 mankind, who was absolute in himself, did not retain any vestige of his 204113 past remembrance in him.
204114

204115 18. The first born, who had nothing to remember of a prior birth, was 204116 born in the lotus with his own intelligence—_chaitanya_ ; (and not 204117 because of his remembrance).
204118

204119 19. The lord of creatures being thus born by chance of his own genius 204120 or creative power, and without any assignable cause or design on his 204121 part, reflected within himself "now I am become another and the source 204122 of creation."
204123

204124 20. Whatever is thus born of itself, is as it were nothing and never 204125 produced at all, but remained as the absolute intellect itself in 204126 _nubibus_ (chinnabhas).
204127

204128 21. It is the Supreme being that is the sole cause of both states of 204129 reminiscence (_i.e._ the one caused by vestiges of prior impressions, 204130 and the other produced by prior desires); and both the conditions of 204131 cause and effect combine in Him in the sphere of his intellect.
204132

204133 22. Thus it is the knowledge of the union of the cause and effect, and 204134 the auxiliary cause in Him, that gives us our tranquillity and naught
204135 otherwise.
204136

204137 23. Causality and consequence are mere empty words of no significance, 204138 since it is the recognition of the universal intellect, which 204139 constitutes true wisdom.
204140

204141 24. Hence nothing is produced that is seen in the phenomenal, or known 204142 in the noumenal or intellectual world (_Chid-jagat_); but every thing is situated within the space of the sphere of the intellect in one's own soul.

25. Lílá said:—O! wonderful was the sight thou hast shown me, O goddess; it was a fair prospect of the world as in its morning light, and as brilliant as in the glare of a lightning.

26. Now goddess! deign to satisfy my curiosity, until I become conversant with it by my intense application and study.

27. Kindly take me to that dwelling where the Bráhman pair dwelt together, and show me that mountainous spot of their former residence.

28. The goddess replied:—If you want to see that sight, you shall have to be immaculate, by forsaking the sense of your personality (mana_ or meum_), and betaking yourself to the clairvoyance or clear sightedness of seeing the unintelligible Intellect (achetya-chit_) within the soul.

29. You shall then find yourself in a vacuous atmosphere (vyomátman_), and situated in the sky (nabhas-nubibus_), resembling the prospects of earthly men, and the apartments of the firmament (i.e._ all nil_ and void).

30. In this state we shall be able to see them with all their possessions without any obstruction; otherwise this body is a great barrier in the way of spiritual vision.

31. Lílá said:—Tell me kindly, O goddess! the reason, why do we not see the other world with these eyes, nor go there with these bodies of ours.

32. The goddess replied:—The reason is that you take the true futurity for false, and believe the untrue present as true. For these worlds which are formless, appear as having forms to your eyes, as you take the substance gold in its form of a ring.

33. Gold though fashioned as a circlet, has no circularity in it; so the spirit of God appearing in the form of the world, is not the world itself.

34. The world is a vacuity full with the spirit of God; and whatever else is visible in it, is as the dust appearing to fly over the sea. (Hence called máyá_ or illusion of vision, as specks peopling the summer skies).

35. This illusory quintessence of the world is all false, the true reality being the subjective Brahma alone; and in support of this truth we have the evidence of our guides in Vedánta philosophy, and the conviction of our consciousness.

36. The Brahma believer sees Brahma alone and no other anywhere, and he looks to Brahma through Brahma himself, as the creator and preserver of all, and whose nature includes all other attributes in itself.

37. Brahma is not known only as the author of his work of the creation of worlds, but as existent of himself without any causation or auxiliary causality (i.e._ as neither the creator or created, nor supporter of nor supported by another).

38. Until you are trained by your practice of Yoga, to rely in one unity, by discarding all duality and variety in your belief, so long you are barred from viewing Brahma in his true light.

39. Being settled in this belief of unity, we find ourselves by our constant practice of Yoga communion, to rest in the Supreme spirit.

40. We then find our bodies mixing with the air as an aerial substance, and at last come to the sight of Brahma with these our mortal frames.

41. Being then endued with pure, enlightened and spiritual frames, like those of Brahmá and the gods, the holy saints are placed in some part of the divine essence.
42. Without practice of yoga, you can not approach God with your mortal frame. The soul that is sullied by sense, can never see the image of God.
43. It is impossible for one to arrive at the aerial castle (objects of the wish) of another, when it is not possible for him to come to the castle (wished for object), which he has himself built in air.
44. Forsake therefore this gross body, and assume your light intellectual frame; then betake yourself to the practice of yoga, that you may see God face to face.
45. As it may be possible to realize an aerial castle by the labour of building it, so it is possible to behold God, either with this body or without it, by practice of yoga only and not otherwise.
46. And as the erroneous conception of the existence of the world, has continued since its first creation (by the will of Brahma); so it has been ever since attributed to an eternal fate-niyati (by fatalists), and to an illusory power (_máya sakti of Máya vadis_).
47. Lílá asked:—Thou saidst O goddess? that we shall go together to the abode of the Brahman pair, but I ask thee to tell me, how are we to effect our journey there?
48. As for me, I shall be able to go there with the purer part of my essence the sentient soul (after leaving this my gross body here). But tell me how wilt thou that art pure intellect (_chetas_), go to that place?
49. The goddess replied:—I tell thee lady, that the divine will is an aerial tree, and its fruits are as unsubstantial as air, having no figure nor form nor substance in them.
50. And whatever is formed by the will of God from the pure essence of his intelligent nature, is only a likeness of himself, and bears little difference from its original.
51. This body of mine is of the like kind, and I will not lay it aside, but find out that place by means of this as the breeze finds the odours.
52. And as water mixes with water, fire with fire and air with air, so does this spiritual body easily join with any material form that it likes.
53. But a corporeal body cannot mix with an incorporeal substance, nor a solid rock become the same with an ideal hill.
54. And as your body, which is composed both of its spiritual and mental parts, has become corporeal by its habitual tendency to corporeality.
55. So your material body becomes spiritual (_átiváhika_), by means of your leaning to spirituality, as in your sleep, in your protracted meditation, insensibility, fancies and reveries.
56. Your spiritual nature will then return to your body, when your earthly desires are lessened and curbed within the mind.
57. Lílá said:—Say goddess, what becomes of the spiritual body after it has attained its compactness by constant practice of yoga; whether it becomes indestructible, or perishes like all other finite bodies.
58. The goddess replied:—Any thing that exists is perishable, and of course liable to death; but how can that thing die which is nothing, and is imperishable in its nature? (Such is the spirit).

59. Again the fallacy of the snake in a rope being removed, the snake disappears of itself, and no one doubts of it any more.

60. Thus, as the true knowledge of the rope, removes the erroneous conception of the snake in it, so the recognition of the spiritual body, dispels the misconception of its materiality.

61. All imagery is at an end when there is no image at all, as the art of statuary must cease for want of stones on earth. (Thus they attribute materiality to the immaterial spirit from their familiarity with matter).

62. We see clearly our bodies full of the spirit of God, which you can not perceive owing to your gross understanding.

63. In the beginning when the intellect—_chit_, is engrossed with the imagination of the mind—_chitta_, it loses thenceforth its sight of the only one object (the unity of God).

64. Lílá asked:—But how can imagination have any room or trace out anything in that unity, wherein the divisions of time and space and all things, are lost in an undistinguishable mass?

65. The goddess replied:—Like the bracelet in gold and waves in water, the show of truth in dreams, and the resemblance of aerial castles:—

66. As all these vanish on the right apprehension of them, so the imaginary attributes of the unpredicable God, are all nothing whatever.

67. As there is no dust in the sky, so there can be no ascribing of any attribute or partial property to God; whose nature is indivisible and unimaginable, who is an unborn unity, tranquil and all-pervading.

68. Whatever shines about us, is the pure light of that being, who scatters his lustre like a transcendental gem all around.

69. Lílá said:—If it is so at all times, then tell me, O goddess! how we happened to fall into the error of attributing duality and diversity to His nature.

70. The goddess replied:—It was your want of reason that has led you to error so long; and it is the absence of reasoning that is the natural bane of mankind, and requires to be remedied by your attending to reason.

71. When reason takes the place of the want of reason, it introduces in a moment the light of knowledge in the soul, in lieu of its former darkness.

72. As reason advances, your want of reason and knowledge and your bondage to prejudice, are put to flight; and then you have an unobstructed liberation and pure understanding in this world.

73. As long as you had remained without reasoning on this subject, so long were you either dormant or wandering in error.

74. You are awakened from this day both to your reason and liberation, and the seeds for the suppression of your desires, are sown in your heart.

75. At first neither was this visible world presented to you nor you to it, how long will you therefore reside in it, and what other desires have you herein?

76. Withdraw your mind from its thoughts of the visitor, visibles and vision of this world, and settle it in the idea of the entire negation of all existence, then fix your meditation solely in the supreme Being, and sit in a state of unalterable insensibility (by forgetting yourself to a stone).

77. When the seed of inappetency has taken root in your heart, and begun to germinate in it, the sprouts of your affections and hatred (literally—pathos and apathy), will be destroyed of themselves.

78. Then the impression of the world will be utterly effaced from the mind, and an unshaken _anesthesia_ will overtake you all at once.

79. Remaining thus entranced in your abstract meditation, you will have in process of time a soul, as luminous as a luminary in the clear firmament of heaven, freed from the concatenation of all causes and their consequences for evermore.

CHAPTER XXII.

PRACTICE OF WISDOM OR WISDOM IN PRACTICE.

(VIJNÁNA-BHYÁSA).

SECTION I.

ABANDONMENT OF DESIRES.

_Básaná Tyága._

The goddess continued:—

As objects seen in a dream, prove to be false as the dream, on being roused from sleep and upon knowing them as fumes of fancy; so the belief in the reality of the body, becomes unfounded upon dissolution of our desires.

2. As the thing dreamt of disappears upon waking, so does the waking body disappear in sleep, when the desires lie dormant in the soul.

3. As our corporeal bodies are awakened after the states of our dreaming and desiring, so is our spiritual body awakened after we cease to think of our corporeal states.

4. As a sound sleep succeeds the dormancy which is devoid of desires (_i.e._ when we are unconscious of the actions and volition of our minds); so does the tranquillity of liberation follow the state of our inappetency even in our waking bodies.

5. The desire of living-liberated men (_jivan-muktas_), is not properly any desire at all, since it is the pure desire relating to universal weal and happiness.

6. The sleep in which the will and wish are dormant, is called the sound sleep _susupta_, but the dormancy of desires in the waking state, is known as insensibility _moha_ or _múrchhá_.

7. Again the sleep which is wholly devoid of desire, is designated the _turiya_ or the fourth stage of yoga, and which in the waking state is called _samádhi_ or union with Supreme.

8. The living man, whose life is freed from all desires in this world, is called the living liberated—_jivan-mukta_, a state which is unknown to them that are not liberated (_amukta_).

9. When the mind becomes a pure essence (as in its _samádhi_), and its desires are weakened, it becomes spiritualised (_atíváhika_), and then 204419 it glows and flows, as the snow melts to water by application of heat.

204421 10. The spiritualised mind, being awakened (as if it were from its 204422 drowsiness or lethargy), mixes with the holy spirits of departed souls 204423 in the other world.

204424
204425 11. When your egoism is moderated by your practice of yoga, then the 204426 perception of the invisible, will of itself rise clearly before your 204427 mind.

204428
204429 12. And when spiritual knowledge gains a firm footing in your mind, you 204430 will then behold the hallowed scenes of the other world more than your 204431 expectation.

204432
204433 13. Therefore O blameless lady! try your utmost to deaden your desires,
204434 and when you have gained sufficient strength in that practice, know
204435 yourself to be liberated in this life.

204436
204437 14. Until the moon of your intellectual knowledge, comes to shine forth
204438 fully with her cooling beams, so long you shall have to leave this body 204439 of yours here, in order to have a view of the other world.

204440
204441 15. This fleshy body of yours, can have no tangible connection with one 204442 which is without flesh; nor can the intellectual body (_lingadeha_), 204443 perform any action of the corporeal system.

204445 16. I have told you all this according to my best knowledge, and the 204446 state of things as they are: and my sayings are known even to boys, to 204447 be as efficacious as the curse or blessing of a deity.

204448
204449 17. It is the habitual reliance of men in their gross bodies, and their 204450 fond attachment to them, that bind their souls down, and bring them 204451 back to the earth; while the weakening of earthly desires serve to 204452 clothe them with spiritual bodies.

204453
204454 18. No body believes in his having a spiritual body here even at his 204455 death bed; but every one thinks the dying man to be dead with his body
204456 for ever.

204458 19. This body however, neither dies, nor is it alive at any time; for 204459 both life and death are mere resemblances of aerial dreams and desires 204460 in all respects.

204461
204462 20. The life and death of beings here below, are as false as the 204463 appearances and disappearance of persons in imagination, (or a man in 204464 the moon), or of dolls in play or puppet shows.

204465
204466 21. Lílá said:—The pure knowledge, O goddess! that thou hast imparted 204467 to me, serves on its being instilled into my ears, as a healing balm to 204468 the pain caused by the phenomenals.

204469 204470 204471 SECTION II.

204472 204473 ON THE PRACTICE OF YOGA.

204474
204475 22. Now tell me the name and nature of the practice, that may be of use 204476 to Spiritualism, how it is to be perfected and what is the end of such 204477 perfection.

204478
204479 23. The goddess replied:—Whatever a man attempts to do here at any 204480 time, he can hardly ever effect its completion, without his painful
204481 practice of it to the utmost of his power.

204482
204483 24. Practice is said by the wise, to consist in the conference of the 204484 same thing with one another, in understanding it thoroughly, and in 204485 devoting one's self solely to his object.

204486
204487 25. And those great souls become successful in this world, who are disgusted with the world, and are moderate in their enjoyments and desires, and do not think on the attainment of what they are in want of.

26. And those great minds are said to be best trained, which are graced with liberal views, and are delighted with the relish of unconcernedness with the world, and enraptured with the streams of heavenly felicity.

27. Again they are called the best practised in divine knowledge, who are employed in preaching the absolute negation of the knower and knowables in this world, by the light of reasoning and Sástras.

28. Also the knowledge, that there was nothing produced in the beginning, and that nothing which is visible, as this world or one's self, is true at any time, is called to be practical knowledge by some.

29. The strong tendency of the soul towards the spirit of God, which results from a knowledge of the nihility of visibles, and subsidence of the passions, is said to be the effect of the practice of Yoga.

30. But mere knowledge of the inexistence of the world, without subduing the passions, is known as knowledge without practice, and is of no good to its possessor.

31. Consciousness of the inexistence of the visible world, constitutes the true knowledge of the knowable. This habitude of the mind is called the practice of Yoga, and leads one to his final extinction—nirvána.

32. The mind thus prepared by practice of Yoga, awakens the intelligence which lay dormant in the dark night of this world, and which now sheds its cooling showers of reason, like dew drops in the frosty night of autumn.

33. As the sage was sermonizing in this manner, the day departed as to its evening service, and led the assembled train to their evening ablutions. They met again with their mutual greetings at the rising beams of the sun after the darkness of night was dispelled.

CHAPTER XXIII.

THE AERIAL JOURNEY OF SPIRITUAL BODIES.

Vasishtha said:—

After this conference between the goddess and that excellent lady on that night, they found the inmates of the family fast asleep in the inner apartment.

2. They entered the charnel-house which was closely shut on all sides by latches fastened to the doors and windows, and which was perfumed with the fragrance of heaps of flowers.

3. They sat beside the corpse decorated with fresh flowers and garments, with their faces shining like the fair full-moon; and brightening the place.

4. They then went to the cemetery and stood motionless on the spot, as if they were sculptures engraven on marble columns, or as pictures drawn upon the wall.

5. They shook off all their thoughts and cares, and became as contracted as the faded blossoms of the lotus at the decline of the day, when their fragrance has fled from them.

6. They remained still, calm and quiet and without any motion of their limbs, like a sheet of clouds hanging on the mountain top in the calm of autumn.

7. They continued in fixed attention without any external sensation, like some lonely creepers shrivelled for want of the moisture of the season.

8. They were fully impressed with the disbelief of their own existence, and that of all other things in the world, and were altogether absorbed in the thought of an absolute privation of every thing at large.

9. They lost the remembrance of the phantom of the phenomenal world, which is as unreal as the horn of a hare.

10. What was a _non ens_ at first, is even so a not-being at present, and what appears as existent, is as inexistent as the water in a mirage.

11. The two ladies then became as quiet as inert nature herself, and as still as firmament before the luminous bodies rolled about in its ample sphere.

12. They then began to move with their own bodies, the goddess of wisdom in her form of intelligence, and the queen in her intellectual and meditative mood.

13. With their new bodies they rose as high as one span above the ground, then taking the forms of the empty intellect, they began to mount in the sky.

14. The two ladies then with their playful open eyes, ascended to the higher region of the sky, by their nature of intellectual knowledge.

15. Then they flew higher and higher by force of their intellect, and arrived at a region stretching millions of leagues in length.

16. Here the pair in their etherial forms, looked about according to their nature in search of some visible objects; but finding no other figure except their own, they became much more attached to each other by their mutual affection.

CHAPTER XXIV.

THE AERIAL JOURNEY.

Vasishtha continued:-

Thus ascending higher and higher and reaching by degrees the highest station, they went on viewing the heavens, with their hands clasped in each other's.

2. They saw a vast expanse as that of the wide extended universal ocean, deep and translucent within; but soft with etherial mildness, and a cooling breeze infusing heavenly delight.

3. All delightful and pleasant was the vast Ocean of vacuity, into which they dived, and which afforded them a delight far greater in its purity, than what is derived from the company of the virtuous.

4. They wandered about all sides of heaven, under the beams of the full moon shining above them; and now halted under the clear vault of the clouds, covering the mountain tops of _Meru_, as if under the dome of a huge white washed edifice.

5. And now they roved by the regions of Siddhas and Gandharvas,

204626 breathing the charming fragrance of Mandára chaplets; and now passing 204627 the lunar sphere, they inhaled the sweet scent exhaled by the breeze
204628 from that nectarious orb (Sudhákara).

204629
204630 6. Now tired and perspiring profusely, they bathed in the lakes of 204631 showering clouds, fraught with the blushing lotuses of lurid lightnings
204632 flashing within them.

204633
204634 7. They promenaded at random of their free will on all sides, and now 204635 alighted like fluttering bees on the tops of high mountains, appearing 204636 as filaments of the lotus-like earth below.

204638 8. They roved also under the vaults of some fragments of clouds, which 204639 were scattered by the winds, and raining like the cascade of Ganges, 204640 thinking them as shower-bath-houses in the air.

204641
204642 9. Then failing in their strength, they halted in many places, with 204643 their slow and slackened steps, and beheld the vacuum full of great and 204644 wondrous works.

204645 SECTION II.

204646 DESCRIPTION OF THE HEAVEN.

204647
204648
204649
204650
204651 10. They saw what they had never seen before, the tremendous depth of 204652 vacuity, which was not filled up by the myriads of worlds which kept 204653 revolving in it.

204654
204655 11. Over and over and higher and higher, they saw the celestial spheres
204656 filled with luminous orbs adorned with their ornamental stars, roving 204657 one above and around the other.

204658
204659 12. Huge mountainous bodies as the Meru moved about in the vacuous 204660 space, and emitted a rubicund glare, like a flame of fire from within 204661 their bowels on all sides.

204663 13. There were beautiful table-lands, like those of the Himálayas, with 204664 their pearly peaks of snow; and also mountains of gold, spreading an 204665 aureate hue over the land.

204666
204667 14. They saw in some place mountains of emerald, tinging the landscape
204668 with verdant green, as it were a bed of grass; and in others some dark 204669 cloud, dimming the sight of the spectator, and hiding the spectacle in 204670 dark blackness.

204671
204672 15. They beheld also tracts of blue sapphire, with creepers of párijáta
204673 flowers, blooming with their blossoms as banners in the azure skies.

204674
204675 16. They saw the flights of Siddhas (or departed holy spirits), the 204676 flight of whose minds outstripped the swiftness of the winds; and heard 204677 the vocal music of the songs of heavenly nymphs in their aerial abodes.

204678
204679 17. All the great bodies in the universe (the planetary system), were 204680 in continual motion; and the spirits of the gods and demigods, were 204681 moving about unseen by one another.

204682
204683 18. Groups of spiritual beings, as the Kushmándas, Rákshasas and 204684 Pisáchas, were seated in aerial circles at the borders; and the winds 204685 and gales blowing with full force in their etherial course.

204686
204687 19. Loud roarings of clouds, as those of the crackling wheels of 204688 heavenly cars, were heard in some places; and the noise of rapid stars, 204689 resembled the blowing of pneumatic engines.

204690
204691 20. There the half burnt Siddhas, were flying from their burning cars
204692 under the solar rays, by reason of their nearness to the Sun; and the 204693 solar embers were flung afar by the breath of the nostrils of his 204694 horses. (It means the falling of the burning meteors and meteorolites from the sky).

21. In some places they beheld the rulers of men, and trains of Apsaras, hurrying up and down the air; and in others, the goddesses roving amidst the smoky and fiery clouds in the firmament.

22. Here they saw some sparks of light, falling like the jewels of celestial nymphs, in their hurried flight to their respective spheres; and there they beheld the lightsome spirits of lesser Siddhas dwindling into darkness.

23. Flakes of mists were falling off from the clouds, as if by friction of the bodies of turbulent spirits, rushing up and down the skies; and shrouding the sides of mountains as with sheets of cloth.

24. Fragments of clouds, beset by groups in the shapes of crows, owls and vultures, were flying about in the air; and there were seen some monsters also, as Dákinis heaving their heads in the forms of huge surges, in the cloudy ocean of the sky.

25. There were bodies of Yoginís too, with their faces resembling those of dogs, ravens, asses and camels, who were traversing the wide expanse of the heavens to no purpose.

26. There were Siddhas and Gandharvas, sporting in pairs in the coverts of dark, smoky and ash coloured clouds, spread before the regents of the four quarters of the skies.

27. They beheld the path of the planets (the zodiac), which resounded loudly with the heavenly music of the spheres; and that path also (of the lunar mansions), which incessantly marked the course of the two fortnights.

28. They saw the sons of gods moving about in the air, and viewing with wonder the heavenly stream of Ganges (the milky way), which was studded with stars, and rolling with the rapidity of winds.

29. They saw the gods wielding their thunderbolts, discuses, tridents, swords and missiles; and heard Nárada and Tumburu singing in their aerial abodes on high.

30. They beheld the region of the clouds, where there were huge bodies of them mute as paintings, and pouring forth floods of rain as in the great deluge.

31. In some place they saw a dark cloud, as high as the mountain-king Himálaya, slowly moving in the air; and at others some of a golden hue as at the setting sun.

32. In some place there were flimsy sheets of clouds, as are said to hover on the peaks of the Rishya range; and at another a cloud like the calm blue bed of the Sea, without any water in them.

33. There were tufts of grass seen in some places, as if blown up by the winds and floating in the stream of air; and swarms of butterflies at others with their glossy coats and wings.

34. In some place, there was a cloud of dust raised by the wind, and appearing as a lake on the top of a mountain.

35. The Mátris were seen, to be dancing naked in their giddy circles in some place, and the great Yoginís sat at others, as if ever and anon giddy with intoxication.

36. There were circles of holy men, sitting in their calm meditation in one place; and pious saints at others, who had cast away their worldly cares at a distance.

37. There was a conclave of celestial choristers, composed of heavenly nymphs, Kinnaras and Gandharvas in one place; and some quiet towns and cities situated at others.

38. There were the cities of Brahmá and Rudra full with their people, and the city of illusion (Máyá) with its increasing population.

39. There were crystal lakes in some places and stagnant pools at others; and lakes with the Siddhas seated by them, and those embosomed by the rising moon.

40. They saw the sun rising in one part, and the darkness of night veiling the others; the evening casting its shadow on one, and the dusky mists of dusk obscuring the other.

41. There were the hoary clouds of winter in some places, and those of the rains in others; somewhere they appeared as tracts of land and at another as a sheet of water.

42. Bodies of gods and demigods, were roving from one side to the other; some from east to west, and others from north to the south.

43. There were mountains heaving their heads to thousands of miles in their height; and there were valleys and caves covered in eternal darkness.

44. There was a vast inextinguishable fire, like that of the blazing sun in one place; and a thickly frost covering the moon-light in another. (The burning heat of the tropics and the cold of the frigid zone).

45. Somewhere there was a great city, flourishing with groves and arbours; and at another big temples of gods, levelled to the ground by the might of demons.

46. In some place there was a streak of light, described by a falling meteor in the sky; in another the blaze of a comet with its thousand fiery tails in the air.

47. In one place there was a lucky planet, rising with its full orb to the view; in another there spread the gloom of night, and full sunshine in another.

48. Here the clouds were roaring, and there they were dumb and mute; here were the high blasts driving the clouds in air, and there the gentle breeze dropping the clusters of flowers on the ground.

49. Sometimes the firmament was clear and fair, and without an intercepting cloud in it, and as transparent as the soul of a wise man, delighted with the knowledge of truth.

50. The vacuous region of the celestial gods, was so full with the dewy beams (_himánsu_) of the silvery orb of the moon (_sweta-váha_), that it appeared as a shower of rain, and raised the loud croaking of the frogs below.

51. There appeared flocks of peacocks and goldfinches, to be fluttering about in some place, and vehicles of the goddesses and Vidyádhariś thronging at another.

52. Numbers of Kártikeya's peacocks were seen dancing amidst the clouds, and a flight of greenish parrots was seen in the sky appearing as a verdant plain.

53. Dwarfish clouds were moving like the stout buffaloes of Yama; and others in the form of horses, were grazing on the grassy meadows of clouds.

54. Cities of the gods and demons, appeared with their towers on high; and distinct towns and hills, were seen at distances, as if detached from one another by the driving winds.

55. In some place, gigantic Bhairavas were dancing with their mountainous bodies; and great _garudas_ were flying at another, as winged mountains in the air.

56. Huge mountains also, were tossed about by the blowing of winds; and the castles of the Gandharvas, were rising and falling with the celestial nymphs in them.

57. There were some clouds rising on high, and appearing as rolling mountains in the sky, crushing down the forests below; and the sky appeared in some place, as a clear lake abounding in lotuses.

58. The moon-beams shone brightly in one spot, and sweet cooling breezes blew softly in another. Hot sultry winds were blowing in some place, and singeing the forest on the mountainous clouds.

59. There was a dead silence in one spot, caused by perfect calmness of the breeze; while another spot presented a scene of a hundred peaks, rising on a mountainlike cloud.

60. In one place the raining clouds, were roaring loudly in their fury; and in another a furious battle was waging between the gods and demons in the clouds.

61. In some place the geese were seen gabbling in the lotus lake of the sky, and inviting the ganders by their loud cackling cries.

62. Forms of fishes, crocodiles and alligators, were seen flying in the air, as if they were transformed to aerial beings, by the holy waters of their natal Ganges.

63. They saw somewhere the eclipse of the moon, by the dark shadow of the earth, as the sun went down the horizon; and so they saw the eclipse of the sun by the shadow of the moon falling on his disk.

64. They saw a magical flower garden, exhaling its fragrance in the air; and strewing the floor of heaven, with profusion of flowers, scattered by showers of morning dews.

65. They beheld all the beings contained in the three worlds, to be flying in the air, like a swarm of gnats in the hollow of a fig tree; and then the two excellent ladies stopped in their aerial journey, intent upon revisiting the earth.

NOTE. Most part of the above description of the heavens, consists of the various appearances of the clouds, and bears resemblance to Shelly's poetical description of them. All this is expressed by one word in the Cloud-Messenger of Kálidása, where the cloud is said to be "_Káma rúpa_" or assuming any form at pleasure.

CHAPTER XXV.

DESCRIPTION OF THE EARTH.

These ladies then alighted from the sky in their forms of intelligence, and passing over the mountainous regions, saw the habitations of men on the surface of the earth.

2. They saw the world situated as a lotus, in the heart of the first male Nara (Brahmá); the eight sides forming the petals of the flower, the hills being its pistils, and the pericarp containing its sweet flavour.

3. The rivers are the tubes of its filaments, which are covered with drops of snow resembling their dust. The days and nights rolling over it, like swarms of black-bees and butterflies, and all its living beings appearing as gnats fluttering about it.
4. Its long stalks which are as white as the bright day light, are composed of fibres serving for food, and of tubes conducting the drink to living beings.
5. It is wet with moisture, which is sucked by the sun, resembling the swan swimming about in the air. It folds itself in sleep in the darkness of night in absence of the sun.
6. The earth like a lotus is situated on the surface of the waters of the ocean, which make it shake at times, and cause the earthquake by their motion. It is supported upon the serpent Vāsuki serving for its understalk, and is girt about by demons as its thorns and prickles.[15]
7. The mount Meru (and others) are its large seeds, and the great hives of human population; where the fair daughters of the giant race, propagated (the race of men), by their sweet embrace (with the sons of God).[16]
8. It has the extensive continent of Jambudwīpa situated in one petal, the petioles forming its divisions, and the tubular filaments its rivers.
9. The seven elevated mountains, forming the boundary lines of this continent, are its seeds; and the great mount of Sumeru reaching to the sky, is situated in the midst. (_i.e._ The topmost north pole).
10. Its lakes are as dewdrops on the lotus-leaf, and its forests are as the farina of the flower; and the people inhabiting the land all around, are as a swarm of bees about it.
11. Its extent is a thousand yojanas square, and is surrounded on all sides by the dark sea like a belt of black bees.
12. It contains nine _varshas_ or divisions, which are ruled by nine brother kings, resembling the regents of its eight petalled sides, with the Bhārata-varsha in the midst.
13. It stretches a million of miles with more of land than water in it. Its habitable parts are as thickly situated as the frozen ice in winter.
14. The briny ocean which is twice as large as the continent, girds it on the outside, as a bracelet encircles the wrist.
15. Beyond it lies the Sāka continent of a circular form, and twice as large as the former one, which is also encircled by the sea.
16. This is called the milky ocean for the sweetness of its water, and is double the size of the former sea of salt.
17. Beyond that and double its size is the Kusadwīpa continent, which is full of population. It is also of the size of a circle, and surrounded by another sea.
18. Around it lies the belt of the sea of curds, delectable to the gods, and double the size of the continent which is encircled by it.
19. After that lies the circle of the Krauncha dwīpa, which is also twice the size of the former one, and surrounded by a sea in the manner of a city by a canal.
20. This sea is called the sea of butter, and is twice as large as the continent which is girt by it. Beyond it lies the Sālmali dwīpa, girt by the foul sea of wine.

204971 21. The fair belt of this sea resembles a wreath of white flowers, like 204972 the girdle of the _Sesha_ serpent, forming the necklace hanging on the 204973 breast of Hari.
204974
204975 22. Thereafter is stretched the Plaxa dwípa, double the size of the 204976 former, and encircled by the belt of the sea of sugar, appearing as the 204977 snowy plains of Himálaya.
204978
204979 23. After that lies the belt of the Pushkara dwípa, twice as large as 204980 the preceding one, and encircled by a sea of sweet water double its 204981 circumference.
204982
204983 24. Hence they saw at the distance of ten degrees, the descent to the 204984 infernal regions; where there lay the belt of the south polar circle, 204985 with its hideous cave below.
204986
204987 25. The way to the infernal cave is full of danger and fear, and ten 204988 times in length from the circle of the _dwípas_ (continents).
204989
204990 26. This cave is encompassed on all sides by the dreadful vacuum, and 204991 is half covered below by a thick gloom, appearing as a blue lotus 204992 attached to it.
204993
204994 27. There stood the Lokáloka Kumeru or South Polar mountain, which 204995 is bright with sun-shine on one side, and covered by darkness on the 204996 other, and is studded with various gems on its tops, and decked with 204997 flowers growing upon it.
204998
204999 28. It reflected the glory of the three worlds (in the everlasting 205000 snows), which are clapped as a cap of hairs on its top.
205001
205002 29. At a great distance from it, is a great forest, untrod by the 205003 feet of any living being; and then proceeding upward, they saw the 205004 great northern ocean encompassing the pole on all sides.
205005
205006 30. Further on they beheld the flaming light of the aurora borealis, 205007 which threatened to melt the snowy mountain to water.
205008
205009 31. Proceeding onward, they met with the fierce Boreas or north winds, 205010 blowing with all their fury and force.
205011
205012 32. They threatened to blow away and uproot the mountains, as if they 205013 were dust or grass; and traversed the empty vacuum with their noiseless 205014 motion.
205015
205016 33. Afar from these they saw the empty space of vacuum, stretching wide 205017 all about them.
205018
205019 34. It spreads around to an unlimited extent, and encompasses the 205020 worlds as a golden circlet encircles the wrist (_i.e._ the belt of the 205021 zodiac).
205022
205023 35. Thus Lílá, having seen the seas and mountains, the regents of the 205024 worlds, the city of the gods, the sky above and the earth below in the 205025 unlimited concavity of the universe, returned on a sudden to her own 205026 land, and found herself in her closet again.

205031 CHAPTER XXVI.

205032 MEETING THE SIDDHAS

205033
205034
205035
205036 Vasishtha said:—After the excellent ladies had returned from their 205037 visit of the mundane sphere, they entered the abode where the Bráhma
205038 had lived before.
205039

2. There the holy ladies saw in that dwelling, and unseen by any body, the tomb or tope of the Bráhmaṇ.

3. Here the maid servants were dejected with sorrow, and the faces of the women were soiled with tears. Their countenances had faded away, like lotuses with their withered leaves.

4. All joy had fled from the house, and left it as the dry bed of the dead sea, after its waters were sucked by the scorching sun (Agastya). It was as a garden parched in summer, or a tree struck by lightening.

5. It was as joyless as the dried lotus, torn by a blast or withering under the frost; and as faint as the light of a lamp, without its wick or oil; and as dim as the eyeball without its light.

6. The house without its master, was as doleful as the countenance of a dying person, or as a forest with its falling and withered leaves, and as the dry and dusty ground for want of rain.

7. Vasishtha continued:—Then the lady with her gracefulness of divine knowledge, and the elegance of her perfections, and her devotedness to and desire of truth, thought within herself, that the inmates of the house might behold her and the goddess, in their ordinary forms of human beings.

9. The dwellers of the house then beheld the two ladies as Laxmí and Gaurí together, and brightening the house with the effulgence of their persons.

10. They were adorned from head to foot, with wreaths of unfading flowers of various kinds; and they seemed like Flora—the genius of spring, perfuming the house with the fragrance of a flower garden.

11. They appeared to rise as a pair of moons, with their cooling and pleasant beams; infusing a freshness to the family, as the moonlight does to the medicinal plants in forests and villages.

12. The soft glances of their eyes, under the long, loose and pendant curls of hair on their foreheads, shed as it were a shower of white _málati_ flowers, from the dark cloudy spots of their nigrescent eyes.

13. Their bodies were as bright as melted gold, and as tremulous as the flowing stream. The current of their effulgence, cast a golden hue on the spot where they stood, as also over the forest all around.

14. The natural beauty of Laxmí's body, and the tremulous glare of Lílá's person, spread as it were, a sea of radiance about them, in which their persons seemed to move as undulating waves.

15. Their relaxed arms resembling loose creepers, with the ruddy leaflets of their palms, shook as fresh Kalpa creepers in the forest.

16. They touched the ground again with their feet, resembling the fresh and tender petals of a flower, or like lotuses growing upon the ground.

17. Their appearance seemed to sprinkle ambrosial dews all around, and made the dry withered and brown boughs of _tamála_ trees, to vegetate anew in tender sprouts and leaflets.

18. On seeing them, the whole family with Jyeshtha Sarmá (the eldest boy of the deceased Bráhmaṇ), cried aloud and said, "Obeisance to the sylvan goddesses," and threw handfuls of flowers on their feet.

19. The offerings of flowers which fell on their feet, resembled the showers of dew-drops, falling on lotus leaves in a lake of lotuses.

20. Jyeshtha Sarmá said:—Be victorious, ye goddesses! that have come here to dispel our sorrow; as it is inborn in the nature of good people, to deliver others from their distress.

205109
205110 21. After he had ended, the goddesses addressed him gently and said, 205111 tell us the cause of your sorrow, which has made you all so sad.
205112
205113 22. Then Jyeshtha Sarmá and others related to them one by one their 205114 griefs, owing to the demise of the Bráhmaṇ pair.
205115
205116 23. They said:—Know O goddess pair! there lived here a Bráhmaṇ and 205117 his wife, who had been the resort of guests and a support of the 205118 Bráhmaṇical order.
205119
205120 24. They were our parents, and have lately quitted this abode; and 205121 having abandoned us with all their friends and domestic animals here, 205122 have departed to heaven, and left us quite helpless in this world.
205123
205124 25. The birds there sitting on the top of the house, have been 205125 continually pouring in the air, their pious and mournful ditties over 205126 the dead bodies of the deceased.
205127
205128 26. There the mountains on all sides, have been lamenting their loss, 205129 in the hoarse noise (of the winds) howling in their caverns, and 205130 shedding showers of their tears in the course of the streams issuing 205131 from their sides.
205132
205133 27. The clouds have poured their tears in floods of rainwater, and fled 205134 from the skies; while the quarters of the heavens have been sending 205135 their sighs in sultry winds all around.
205136
205137 28. The poor village people are wailing in piteous notes, with their 205138 bodies mangled by rolling upon the ground, and trying to yield up their 205139 lives with continued fasting.
205140
205141 29. The trees are shedding their tears every day in drops of melting 205142 snow, exuding from the cells of their leaves and flowers, resembling 205143 the sockets of their eyes.
205144
205145 30. The streets are deserted for want of passers-by, and have become 205146 dusty without being watered. They have become as empty as the hearts of 205147 men forsaken by their joys of life.
205148
205149 31. The fading plants are wailing in the plaintive notes of Cuckoos 205150 and the humming of bees; and are withering in their leafy limbs by the 205151 sultry sighs of their inward grief.
205152
205153 32. The snows are melt down by the heat of their grief and falling in 205154 the form of cataracts, which break themselves to a hundred channels by 205155 their fall upon stony basins.
205156
205157 33. Our prosperity has fled from us, and we sit here in dumb despair of 205158 hope. Our houses have become dark and gloomy as a desert.
205159
205160 34. Here the humble bees, are humming in grief upon the scattered 205161 flowers in our garden, which now sends forth a putrid smell instead of 205162 their former fragrance.
205163
205164 35. And there the creepers that twined so gayly round the vernal 205165 arbors, are dwindling and dying away with their closing and fading
205166 flowers.
205167
205168 36. The rivulets with their loose and low purling murmur, and light
205169 undulation of their liquid bodies in the ground, are running hurriedly
205170 in their sorrow, to cast themselves into the sea.
205171
205172 37. The ponds are as still in their sorrow, as men sitting in their 205173 meditative posture (Samádhi), notwithstanding the disturbance of the 205174 gnats flying incessantly upon them.
205175
205176 38. Verily is that part of the heaven adorned this day by the presence
205177 of our parents, where the bodies of heavenly choristers, the Kinnaras, Gandharvas and Vidyádhara, welcome them with their music.

39. Therefore, O Devis! assuage this our excessive grief; as the visit of the great never goes for nothing.

40. Hearing these words, Lílá gently touched the head of her son with her hand, as the lotus-bed leans to touch its offshoot by the stalk.

41. At her touch the boy was relieved of all his sorrow and misfortune, just as the summer heat of the mountain, is allayed by the showers of the rainy season.

42. All others in the house, were as highly gratified at the sight of the goddesses, as when a pauper is relieved of his poverty, and the sick are healed by a draught of nectar.

43. Ráma said:—Remove my doubt, sir, why Lílá did not appear in her own figure before her eldest son—Jyeshtha Sarmá.

44. Vasishtha answered:—You forget, O Ráma! to think that Lílá had a material body, or could assume any at pleasure. She was in her form of pure intellect (lingadeha), and it was with her spiritual hand that she touched the inner spirit of the boy and not his body. (Gloss). Because whoso believes himself to be composed of his earthly body only, is verily confined in that; but he who knows his spirituality, is as free as air: (and it was in this aerial form that Lílá was ranging about and touched her son).

45. Belief in materialism leads one to think his unreal earthly frame as real, as a boy's belief in ghosts makes him take a shadow for a spirit.

46. But this belief in one's materiality, is soon over upon conviction of his spirituality; as the traces of our visions in a dream, are effaced on the knowledge of their unreality upon waking.

47. The belief of matter as (vacuous) nothing, leads to the knowledge of the spirit. And as a glass door appears as an open space to one of a bilious temperament, so does matter appear as nothing to the wise.

48. A dream presents us the sights of cities and lands, of air and water, where there are no such things in actuality; and it causes the movements of our limbs and bodies (as in somnambulation) for nothing.

49. As the air appears as earth in dreaming, so does the non-existent world appear to be existent in waking. It is thus that men see and talk of things unseen and unknown in their fits of delirium.

50. So boys see ghosts in the air, and the dying man views a forest in it; others see elephants in clouds, and some see pearls in sun-beams.

51. And thus those that are panic-struck and deranged in their minds, the halfwaking and passengers in vessels, see many appearances like the aforesaid ghosts and forests, as seen by boys and men in the air, and betray these signs in the motions and movements of their bodies.

52. In this manner every one is of the form of whatever he thinks himself to be; and it is habit only that makes him to believe himself as such, though he is not so in reality.

53. But Lílá who had known the truth and inexistence of the world, was conscious of its nothingness, and viewed all things to be but erroneous conceptions of the mind.

54. Thus he who sees Brahma only to fill the sphere of his intellect, has no room for a son or friend or consort to abide in it.

55. He who views the whole as full with the spirit of Brahma, and nothing produced in it, has no room for his affection or hatred to any body in it.

56. The hand that Lílá laid on the head of Jyeshtha Sarmá—her eldest son, was not lain from her maternal affection for him, but for his edification in intellectual knowledge.

57. Because the intellect being awakened, there is all felicity attendant upon it. It is more subtile than ether and far purer than vacuum, and leads the intellectual being above the region of air. All things beside are as images in a dream.

CHAPTER XXVII.

PAST LIVES OF LÍLÁ.

The two ladies then disappeared from that place, leaving the Bráhmaṇ family at their house in the mountainous village.

2. The family exclaimed "We are highly favoured by the sylvan goddesses;" and then forgetting their grief, they betook themselves to their domestic employments.

3. Then the ethereal goddess spake to the aerial-Lílá, who stood fixed in air, over the mansion of the Bráhmaṇ, in a state of mute astonishment.

4. They then conversed as familiarly with each other, as persons having the same thoughts and desires, agree with one another in their views and acts; and as the dreamers of the same dream hold their mutual correspondence, like _Usha and Aniruddha_ (the Cupid and Psyche of India).

5. Their conversation in their immaterial forms, was of the same intellectual (psychical) kind, as we are conscious of in our dreams and imaginations.

6. Sarasvatí said:—Now you have fully known the knowable, and become acquainted with whatever is visible and invisible: such is the essence of Brahma; say now what more you want to know.

7. Lílá said:—Tell me the reason why I was seen by my son, and not where the spirit of my departed lord is reigning over his realm.

8. Sarasvatí replied:—Because you were not then perfect by your practice of Yoga to have your wish fulfilled, nor had you then lost your sense of duality, which is a preventive of perfection.

9. He who has not known the unity, is not entitled to the acts and benefits of his faith in the true God; as no one sitting in the sun, can enjoy the coolness of shade.

10. You were not practiced to forget your identity as Lílá, nor learnt that it is not your will, but the will of God that is always fulfilled.

11. You have afterwards become of pure desire, and wished that your son might see you, whereby he was enabled to have your sight.

12. Now if you should return to your husband, and do the like, you will undoubtedly be successful in your desire.

13. Lílá said:—I see within the sphere of this dome (of my mind), the Bráhmaṇ to have been my husband before; and I see also in it, that he died and became a ruler of the earth afterwards.

14. I see in it that spot of the earth, that city and that palace of his where I sat as his queen.

15. I see within myself my lord to be reigning in that place, and I see even there how he died afterwards.

16. I see herein the glory of the sovereign of so many countries on earth, and I see also the perfect frankness of his conduct through life.

17. I see the worlds in the inner sky of my mind, as they are placed in a casket, or as the oil is contained in a mustard seed.

18. I see the bright orb of my husband ever roving before me, and now I pray you to contrive any how to place me by his side.

19. The Goddess replied:—Tell me Lílá, to what husband you shall go, as there are hundreds of them that you had, and shall have in your past and future lives, and now there are three of them confined in this earth.

20. The nearest of the three, is the Bráhman who is here reduced to ashes; the next is the prince lying in state and covered with flowers in the inner apartment.

21. The third is now a reigning prince in this earth, and has been buffeting in the waves of error in the vast ocean of the world.

22. His intellect is darkened and disordered by the splashing waves of worldliness, his intelligence is perverted to stupidity, and he is converted to a tortoise in the ocean of the world.

23. The management of his very many disordered state affairs, has stultified him to a lubbard, and he is now fast asleep amidst the turmoils of business.

24. He is fast bound to subjection by the strong chain of his thoughts, that he is a lord, is mighty, accomplished, and that he is happy and is to enjoy his estates for ever.

25. Now say, O excellent lady! to what husband you wish to be led, in the manner of the fragrance of one forest borne by the breeze to another.

26. Here you are in one place, and there they in others amidst this vast world; and the state of their lives and manners differs widely from one another.

27. These orbs of light in the heaven, though they appear to be placed so near us (both to our eyesight and in the mind), are yet situated millions of leagues apart from one another; and the departed souls are carried in them (in their endless transmigrations).

28. And again all these bodies are as vacuous as air, though they contain the great mounts Meru and Mandara in themselves.

29. All bodies are formed by the combination of atoms, incessantly proceeding from the Great Intellect, like particles of sun-beams over the universe.

30. The great and stupendous fabric of the world, is no more (in the eye of intelligence), than a quantity of paddy weighed in the balance.

31. As the spangled heavens appear like a forest full of brilliant gems in it, so the world appears as full of the glory of God to the contemplative mind, and not as composed of earth or other material bodies in it.

32. It is intelligence alone, that shines in the form of world in the intelligent soul, and not any material body, which was never brought into being before.

205386 33. As billows in the lake, rise and set and rise again, so the rising 205387 and falling days and nights present these various scenes to our 205388 knowledge.

205389
205390 34. Lílá said:—So it is, O mother of mankind! and so I come to 205391 remember now, that my present birth (state) is of a royal (_rājasika_)
205392 kind, and neither of too pure nor gross a nature. (_Sattvika or 205393 Tāmasika_).

205394
205395 35. I having descended from Brahmá, had undergone a hundred and eight 205396 births (in different shapes); and after passing various states, I find 205397 myself still in existence.

205399 36. I recollect, O goddess! to have been born in another world before, 205400 and to have been the bride of a Vidyádhara, when I used to rove about 205401 as freely as a bee over flowers.

205402
205403 37. Being debased by my libertinism, I was born in this mortal world, 205404 and became the mate of the king of the feathered tribe (an eagle).

205405
205406 38. And then having been a resident in the woods, I was turned to a 205407 woodman's mate, wearing a vest of leaves on my loins.

205409 39. Growing fond of my life, I sported wantonly about the forest, and 205410 was changed to the _guluncha_ plant, delighting the woods with my leafy 205411 palms and flowering eyes.

205412
205413 40. This arboret of the holy hermitage, was held sacred by the society
205414 of saintly sages; and then I was regenerated in the form of an 205415 anchorite's child, after the woods were burnt down by a wild-fire.

205416
205417 41. Here I was initiated in the formularies for removing the curse of 205418 womanhood, and became as a male being in the person of the handsome 205419 prince of Suráshtra (Surat), where I reigned for a hundred years (or 205420 for a whole century).

205422 42. I was then denounced to become a weasel, and covered with leprosy, 205423 in the lowlands of Táli, on account of my misconduct in the government.

205424
205425 43. I remember, O goddess! how I became a bullock at Surat, and was 205426 goaded by thoughtless cowherd boys, in their merry sport for full eight 205427 years.

205428
205429 44. I bear in mind when I was transformed to a bird, and with what 205430 difficulty I broke the net, that was laid by birdcatchers for my 205431 destruction. It was in the same manner as we release ourselves from the 205432 snares of sinful desires.

205433
205434 45. I remember with pleasure when as a bee, I lighted lightly on the 205435 leaflets of blossoms, sipped the honey of the blooming buds, dined on 205436 the pistils, and slept in the cups of lotus flowers.

205437
205438 46. I wandered about in pleasant wood-lands and lawns, with my exalted 205439 and branching horns and beautiful eyes, in the form of an antelope, 205440 till I was killed by the dart of a huntsman in my mortal part.

205441
205442 47. I have been in the form of a fish, and was lifted up by the waves 205443 of the sea above the surface of the water. I saw how a tortoise was 205444 killed by the blow of a club on the neck, when it failed to break its 205445 back-bone.

205447 48. I was a Chandála huntsman once, roving by the side of Charmanvatí
205448 (the river Chenab), when I used to quench my thirst with cocoa water, 205449 as I was tired with roaming.

205450
205451 49. I became a stork also, delighting in lakes with my mate, and 205452 filling the air with our sweet cries.
205453

205454 50. In another birth, I rambled about in groves of palm and tamála 205455 trees, and fixed my eyes with amorous looks and glances upon my lover.
205456

205457 51. I had next been a fairy Apsará, with a form as bright as melted 205458 gold, and features as beautiful as those of the lotus and lily, in 205459 which the celestials like bees and butterflies, used to take delight.
205460

205461 52. I remember to have decked myself in gold and pearls, and in gems 205462 and rubies upon earth, and to have sported with my youthful consorts in 205463 pleasure gardens and groves, and on hills and mountains.
205464

205465 53. And I remember also to have lived long as a tortoise on the borders 205466 of a river, and to have been carried away by the waves, sometimes under 205467 an arbour of creepers, over-hung with clusters of beautiful flowers;
205468 and at others to some wild cave washed by the waves.
205469

205470 54. I see how I acted the part of a goose with my covering of feathers, 205471 swimming on the high heaving waves on the surface of a lake.
205472

205473 55. Then seeing a poor gnat hanging on the moving leaf of a Sálmalī
205474 branch, I became its associate and as contemptible a thing like itself.
205475

205476 56. I became an aquatic crane also, skimming playfully over the waters
205477 gushing from the hills, and slightly kissing the crests of the waves
205478 rising over the rapid torrent.
205479

205480 57. I remember also how I slighted the loves of amorous youths, and 205481 spurned off from me the Vidyádhara boys on the Gandha Mádana and 205482 Mandara hills.
205483

205484 58. I remember likewise the pangs of a lovelorn lass, when I lay pining 205485 in my bed, strewn over with the fragrance of camphor, and how I was 205486 decaying like the disk of the waning moon.
205487

205488 59. Thus I passed through many births, in the wombs of higher and 205489 lower animals, and found them all to be full of pain. And my soul 205490 has run over the billows of the irresistible current of life, like 205491 the fleet antelope, pacing its speed with the swiftness of the wind
205492 (_Vátapramī_).
205493
205494
205495
205496

205497 CHAPTER XXVIII.

205498 SECTION I.

205499 EXPOSITION OF LÍLÁ'S VISION.

205500
205501
205502
205503
205504 Ráma said:—Tell me sir, in what manner the goddesses broke out of the 205505 strongholds of their bodies, and the prison-house of this world (where 205506 their souls were pent up), and passed through infinite space, to survey 205507 the scenes beyond its confines. (_i.e._ How does the mind and the 205508 flight of imagination, reach to regions unknown and unseen before).
205509

205510 2. Vasishtha replied:—Where is the world and where is its support or 205511 solidity? They were all situated in the region within the minds of the 205512 goddesses.
205513

205514 3. They saw in it the hilly tract, where the Bráhmaṇa Vasishtha had his
205516

205517 4. They saw in a corner of it the deserted mansion of the Bráhmaṇ, and 205518 they saw in it the surface of the earth stretching to the seas (_i.e._ 205519 in their mental view).
205520

205521 5. They beheld in that imaginary spot of earth the city of the prince,
205522 and the royal palace which he had enjoyed with Arundhati his consort

(in his imagination).

6. How she was born under the name of Lílá, and worshipped the goddess of wisdom—Sarasvatí; by whom she was miraculously conveyed to the delightful region of the sky.

7. It was in the mansion situated in that hilly village, that she beheld the world placed within the space of a span of her mind.

8. Having come out of her vision of the world, she found herself seated in her house, as one finds himself lying in his own bed, after his rambling from one dream to another.

9. All that she saw was mere vision and void; there was no world nor earth, nor a house nor the distance thereof.

10. It was the mind which showed them these images, as it presents the objects of our desire to our view; or else there was neither any world nor earth in actuality.

11. The sphere of intelligence is infinite, and without any covering; and being agitated by the powers of one's intellect, it presents all the objects of nature to his view, as the sky when agitated by heat produces the winds.

12. The sphere of the intellect is uncreated (being a mode of the Divinity itself); it is ever calm everywhere; and is supposed as the world itself by deluded minds.

13. He who understands rightly, views the world to be as unsubstantial as air; but whoso is misled by his wrong judgment takes it to be as a solid mountain.

14. As a house and a city are manifested to us in our dream, so is this unreal world presented as a reality to our understandings.

15. As is the misconception of water in the mirage, and the mistake of gold in a bracelet; so does all this unreality appear as a substantiality to the mistaken mind.

16. Discoursing in this manner between themselves, the two charming ladies, walked out of the house with their graceful steps.

SECTION II.

DESCRIPTION OF THE MOUNTAINOUS HABITATION.

17. Being unseen by the village people, they viewed the mountain which stood before them, kissing the vault of heaven, and touching the orb of the sun with its lofty peaks.

18. It was decorated with flowers of various colours, and covered with a variety of woods of various hues. There were waterfalls gushing with their tremendous roarings on one side, and groves resounding with the warbling of birds in another.

19. The clouds were variegated by the many coloured clusters of flowers sweeping over them, and cranes and storks sat screeching on the cloud-capt top of _gulan_ trees.

20. There were the robust reeds, hedging the banks of rivers with their wide stretching stems and roots, and the strong winds tossing about the tender creepers, growing out of the rocky caves, for want of support.

21. The tops of trees covered with flowers, were over-topped by the sheds of clouds hanging from the vault of heaven; which shed profusely their pearly drops of rain water upon them, and formed the current streams below.

22. The banks of the streamlets were continually laved by the waves, raised by the winds playing upon the shaking harbours on them; and a continued cooling shade was spread by the branching trees all around.

23. Standing on that spot, the ladies beheld the hilly hamlet in the lawn, likening a fragment of heaven fallen upon the ground.

24. There the purling rills were softly gliding by, and here the brimming brooks wobbled in the ground. The birds of the air were chirping on the sprays and aquatic fowls were flying about the holes of the sea shore.

25. There they saw the herds of kine slowly moving and grazing in the plains, and filling the echoing woods with their loud lowing; and beheld the space, interspersed with shady groves and harbours and verdant meadows all about.

26. The cliffs were whitened with snow, impenetrable by sun-beams; and the tops of hills were covered with bushy brambles, forming as braids of hair upon their craggy heads.

27. Cascades falling in torrents in the cavities of rocks, and scattering their pearly particles afar, memorialized the churning of the milky ocean by the Mandara mountain.

28. The trees in the glens, loaded as they were with their fruits and flowers, appeared as waiters upon the goddesses, and standing to welcome their approach with their rich presents.

29. Shaken by gusts of roaring winds, the forest trees, were shedding showers of their mellifluous flowers, as offerings to the sylvan gods and people.

30. The birds that approached fearlessly to drink the water dropping from the hill, now fled for fear of their seeming as sleets, shells and shots of archers.

31. The birds parched by thirst, and wishing to drink the water dashed by the waves of the rivulet, were hovering upon it as stars in the sky.

32. There were rows of crows sitting on the tops of the tall _tála_ (or palm) trees, from whose sight the boys were hiding the remains of their sweetmeat.

33. There they beheld the rustic lads with garlands of flowers on their heads and garments; and roaming in the cooling shades of the date, jam and nimba trees.

34. They saw the lean and hungry beggar woman passing slowly by the way, and clad in her flaxen robe, with chaplets of blossoms for her ear dress.

35. They saw the lazy rustics sitting retired in their lonely retreats, and conversing afar from the noisy brooks where they could hardly hear one another.

36. They saw the naked mendicant boys, besmeared in their face and hands with curd, and with cow-dung upon their bodies, and holding the flowery branches of plants in their hands, and crowding in the compound.

37. The bushes on the verdant banks of the river, were shaken to and fro as in a swing by the dashing of the waves, which left their marks on the sandy shore, as the waters receded to their bed.

38. The house was full of flies cloyed with the sweets of milk and curds; but the children were moaning with cries for their want of sufficient food.

205661 39. The herdswomen were observed to be fretting, at seeing their 205662 wristlets daubed by the cow-dung (which they were pasting); and the men 205663 were seen to be smiling, at seeing the eagerness of women, for tying 205664 the loosened knots of their hair.

205665
205666 40. The crows were alighting from the tops of hills, to pick up the 205667 offerings of the holy sages; and the paths about their houses, were 205668 strewn over with the sacred _kuru_ and _kurunta_ leaves.

205669
205670 41. The floral plants growing in the caverns of the hills, and about 205671 the precincts of the house, covered the ground every morning, with 205672 heaps of flowers to the depth of the heels.

205674 42. There were the _chouri_ kine and antelopes, grazing in one part of 205675 the forest; and also the tender fawn sleeping on the bed of grass under 205676 the _gunja_ groves.

205677
205678 43. There were the young calves lying on one side, and shaking their 205679 ears to drive the flies away; which were fluttering on their faces, and 205680 upon the milk exuding from the sides of their mouths.

205681
205682 44. The rooms were stored with honey, which had been collected by 205683 driving the bees from the hives; the gardens were full of flowering 205684 _asokas_ (_asoka Jonesia_); and their rooms were painted with lacdye.

205685
205686 45. The winds moistened by the showers of rain, had given the arboretum 205687 to bloom, and the blooming buds of Kadamba, overhung like a canopy, the 205688 beds of green grass below.

205690 46. The _Ketaka_ (_keya_) arbour was blooming white by removal of its 205691 weeds, and the water-course was gliding along with its soft murmuring 205692 tune.

205693
205694 47. The winds whistled in the windows of the caves, and the clouds 205695 rested on the roofs of the mountain tops; the ponds were brimful of 205696 water, and filled with lotuses like so many lightsome moons.

205697
205698 48. The green arbour cast its cooling and undivided shade upon the 205699 ground, where the dew-drops trembling on the blades of grass, glistened
205700 like twinkling stars in the azure sky.

205701
205702 49. The trees incessantly dropped down their ripened fruits, and dried 205703 flowers and leaves of various sorts, like showers of snow on the 205704 whitened ground.

205705
205706 50. There some clouds were seen to hang continually over the household
205707 compound, like the _chirinti_ (or kulina) girls, that never forsake 205708 the abode of their parents; while there were others hovering over the 205709 roof of the house, and flashing in lightnings that supplied the place
205710 of lights.

205711
205712 51. The altar here, re-echoed to the loud roaring of the winds, 205713 confined in the caverns of the mountains; and the temple there, was 205714 graced by the twittering swallows and parrots, that alighted upon it in 205715 their numerous flights.

205716
205717 52. Soft breezes were moving slowly, loaded with the fragrance exhaled
205718 by the sleepy flowers (in the evening), and gently shaking the leaves 205719 of trees as they passed along the lawn.

205720
205721 53. There the ladies were attentive to the prattling and playful
205722 parrots and partridges, and here they listened to the melodious notes
205723 of the _Kokila_, responsive to the jarring crows on the branches.

205724
205725 54. The palma and tamála trees were loaded with fruits, and the forest
205726 trees were entwined by creepers, which waved their leafy palms around 205727 them.

205729 55. There were the tender ivy creepers, clasping the branches on one side, and the fragrance of the efflorescent Kandala and silindhra plants, exhaled on the other. The tapering tála and tamála trees rising as high as spires, and a cooling breeze was blowing amidst the flower plants in the gardens.

56. There were the kine hastening to drink the water in the troughs, and garden trees hanging with loads of green unripe fruits and beautiful flowers; the running streams were hidden under rows of trees on the banks, and the stalks of plants were studded with flowers without alternation.

57. The gardens were perfumed with the nectarious fragrance of kunda flowers, and the lakes were redolent with the odour of lotuses, hiding the humble bees giddy with liquor, in their honied cells. The air was reddened with the roseate pollen, flying from the crimson lotuses (sthala padmas) of the land, and mocked the redness of Indra's palace in the sky.

58. The gargling noise of the rivulets running down precipitately from the hills, and the whiteness of the hoary cloud, hanging with the hue of kundu flowers over them; the beauty of the flowery parterres in the compound of the house, and the melodious warbling of musical birds singing joyous in the air, enchanted the scene.

59. The youths were sporting on their beds of flowers, and the playful damsels were decked with flowery wreaths hanging down to their feet. The ground was adorned every where with sprouting and prickly shrubs and blades of grass; and there was a beauty displayed in the clasping of creepers about the clumps of reeds.

60. The new shooting buds and blossoms covered the trees around, and fragments of clouds shrouded the houses below; the ground was decorated by wreaths of icicles, and the flash of lightnings in the clouds over the houses, terrified the women within.

61. There was the fragrance of blue lotuses exhaling its sweets about, and the hoarse lowings of the kine, hastening to their green grazing ground. The confident deer and does were lying tamely in the house-yard, and the peacocks dancing merrily before the water-falls, as if they were the showers of rain water.

62. The odoriferous breezes were blowing giddily, with the flavour of the fragrance they bore about; and the medicinal plants were lending their lights like lamps at night. The nests of birds were resonant with ceaseless warblings, and the noise of the cataracts deafened the ears of men on the bank.

63. The pearly dew drops, that were continually dropped on the ground, from the leaves of trees and blades of grass; and the gleaming beauty of the ever blooming blossoms above, form with others, the everlasting charms of mountainous habitations, and baffle the description of poets.

CHAPTER XXIX.

ACCOUNT OF THE PREVIOUS LIFE OF LÍLÁ

A Description of the Domestic Duties of a Hindu Lady.

The two goddesses then alighted in that cooling village seat, as the two states of felicity and liberation, meet in the tranquil spirit of the man knowing the Divine spirit.

2. Lílá, who had by this time, become personified to the form of pure intelligence, by her knowledge of yoga, now became a seer of the three times presenting themselves before her.

- 205799
205800 3. She remembered the whole course of her past life, and derived 205801 pleasure in relating the events of her former life and death.
205802
205803 4. Lílá said:—I recollect by thy favour, O goddess! and by sight of 205804 this place, all what I did and thought of in my past life.
205805
205806 5. Here I had grown up to old age, and here I had withered and become 205807 lean and thin as a skeleton. I was a Bráhmaṇí here, and had my body 205808 scratched by the dried sacrificial grass (_kusa_), which I had to 205809 meddle with.
205810
205811 6. I was the legal wife of my lord, and producer of his race, and was 205812 employed in the acts of milking the kine, and churning the curd (for 205813 butter and _ghee_). I had been mother of many sons, and a kind hostess 205814 to my guests.
205815
205816 7. I was devoted to the service of the gods, Bráhmans and good people,
205817 and rubbed my body with cow milk and _ghee_: I was employed in cleaning
205818 the frying pans and the boiling kettles of the house.
205819
205820 8. I boiled the food daily with a single bracelet of glass and one of 205821 conch-shell in my wrists; and served my father, mother, brother and 205822 daughters and sons-in-law with their daily victuals.
205823
205824 9. I was emaciated in my body like a domestic servant, by working all 205825 day and night; and 'haste and hasten,' were the words I used to repeat 205826 to myself.
205827
205828 10. Being thus busied and employed, I was so silly and ignorant, that I 205829 never thought within myself, even in a dream, about what I was and what 205830 was this world, although I had been the wife of a Bráhmaṇ.
205831
205832 11. Wholly engaged in the collection of fuel, cow-dung, and sacrificial 205833 wood and vegetables, I became emaciated in my body, which was wrapt in 205834 a worn out blanket.
205835
205836 12. I used to pick out the worms from the ears of the milch cow, and 205837 was prompt to water the garden of greens with watering pots in hand.
205838
205839 13. I used to go to the swelling lake every day, and get the fresh 205840 green grass for the fodder of my tender calves. I used to wash and 205841 clean the house every morning, and paint the doorway with the white 205842 tints of pasted and powdered rice (_gundi_).
205843
205844 14. I had to correct my domestics with gentle rebukes, and tell them to 205845 keep within their bounds like the billows in the rivers.
205846
205847 15. With my infirm body and ears shaking as dried leaves of trees, and 205848 supporting myself on a stick, I lived here under the dread of old age.
205849
205850 16. As she was speaking in this manner, and walking in company with 205851 Sarasvatí about the village, in the valley of the mountain, she was 205852 astonished to see her former seats of pleasure, and showed them to the 205853 goddess.
205854
205855 17. This was my flowery arbour, decorated by these torn _pátala_
205856 plants, and this was my garden alcove of flowering Asokas.
205857
205858 18. This is the bank of the pond where the calves were loosely tied to 205859 the trees; and this is my pet calf Karniká, which has refrained from 205860 browsing the leaves (in my absence).
205861
205862 19. This is my watering woman, now so languid and dirty in her
205863 appearance; and weeping these eight days in my absence, with her eyes
205864 daubed in tears.
205865
205866 20. This, O goddess, is the place, where I used to eat and sit, and 205867 where I slept and walked; and these are the places where I gave and received the things to and from my attendants.

21. This is my eldest son Jyeshtha Sarmá, weeping in the house; and this is my milch cow, now grazing on the grassy plain in the forest.

22. I see this portico and these windows, once dear to me as my person, and besmeared with the dry powder of the _huli_ festival of the vernal season.

23. I see these pulpy plants of gourd planted with my own hands, and dear to me as myself, now spreading themselves over the oven place.

24. I see these relatives of mine, who had been the bonds of my life before, now smoking in their eyes with tears, and carrying the fuel for fire, with beads of _rudráksha_ seeds on their bodies.

25. I see that stony shore, baffling the force of the waves, which have been pelting their pebbles against it, now covered by bushes of the beach.

26. The verdant meadows were full of leafy plants, with pendant dew drops on their tips; and the plains were whitened by the hailstones falling on them in showers.

27. The mid-day was mantled by sun beams, as by a white mist of frost, and the arbours resounded with the humming of bees, fluttering about their clustering flowers.

28. The blooming palása glowing as reddish corals, had covered the trees and the land with heaps of crimson flowers.

29. The village rill was flowing with the floating fruits, which it bore from shore to shore; and the rustic lads jumbled together with loud noise, eager to lay hold on them.

30. The cool shady beach of the rill, was strewn over with pebbles, washed and carried away by the current, and covered by leaves falling from the trees.

31. There I see the altar of my house, which is so beautifully ornamented with the flowering creepers, and which is overhung on its windows by clusters of fruits and flowers.

32. Here lived my husband, whose life has fled to the sky in its aerial form, and became afterwards the lord of the earth, reaching to the surrounding seas.

33. I remember, how he had fostered the fond wish of obtaining royal dignity, and how ardently he looked forward on its attainment.

34. I see, O goddess! his royal dignity of eight days, which had seemed to be of so long a duration (as eighty years) before.

35. I see the soul of my Lord, residing in the empty space of this mansion, as in his former kingly state; although it is invisible to all as the current air in the sky, and as the odours borne by the winds.

36. It is in this vacuous space, that his soul is contained in the form of a thumb; which contains in its bosom, the whole extent of the realm of my lord, stretching to thousands of leagues in its circumference.

37. I see also O goddess! the spacious kingdom of my lord, in the space of my intellect, which makes room for thousands of mountains by the miraculous power of God, styled as illusion. (_máya_).

38. I wish now, O Goddess! to see the earthly city of my lord again; let us therefore turn our course that way, as no place is distant to the resolute.

205937 39. Vasishtha said:—Having said so, she bowed down to the goddess and 205938 entered into the shrine, and then like a bird, she flew into the air 205939 with the goddess.

205941 40. It was a region devoid of darkness, and as fair as a sea of 205942 moonlight. And then it was as azure as the person of Náráyana, and as 205943 bright as the back of a locust.

205944
205945 41. They passed above the regions of the clouds and winds, as also 205946 beyond the spheres of the orbits of the sun and moon.

205947
205948 42. They passed beyond the path of the north polar star, and the limits
205949 of the circuits of the sádhyas and siddhas and other celestial beings.

205950
205951 43. Thence they ascended to the higher heavens of Brahmá and the 205952 Tushita divinities, and then upward to the sphere of Golaka (the 205953 zodiac); and thence again to the Sivaloka, and the sphere of the Pitris 205954 or the departed souls of the dead.

205955
205956 44. Passing thus beyond the spheres of the embodied living beings, 205957 and bodiless souls of the dead, they proceeded far and farther to the 205958 unknown regions of empty space.

205959
205960 45. Having passed the etherial sphere, they beheld nothing there, 205961 except the sun, moon and the stars shining below them.

205962
205963 46. There was only a deep darkness to be seen, filling the whole 205964 vacuity of space, and appearing as the basin of the waters of universal 205965 deluge, and as compact as the impenetrable cavity of a rock.

205966
205967 47. Lílá said:—Tell me, O goddess! what became of the light of the 205968 sun and other luminaries, and whence came this dense darkness as to be 205969 compressed under the fist (mushti-gráhya).

205970
205971 48. The goddess replied: you have got to a spot so remote from the 205972 spheres of heaven, that the light of the luminaries can never reach to 205973 it.

205974
205975 49. And as one in a deep dark pit, can see no light of a fire fly 205976 flitting over it; so the solar light is invisible to one behind the 205977 great belt of heaven.

205978
205979 50. Lílá said:—Oh! the great distance that we have come to, whence the 205980 great luminary of the sun also, appears as small as an atom below.

205982 51. Tell me mother, what sort of a place is that which lies beyond this 205983 region, and how can we come to it after traversing this gloomy expanse.

205984
205985 52. Sarasvatí said:—Behind this is the great pole of the universe, 205986 which is scattered over with innumerable nebular stars in the form of 205987 the particles of dust.

205988
205989 53. Vasishtha said:—As they were talking in this manner, they glided
205990 imperceptibly to that pole, as the bee saunters over the solitary hut
205991 on the height of a mountain.

205993 54. They then were at no pains to come down from that precipice, as 205994 there is no pains to effect what must certainly come to pass in the 205995 end, though it appeared difficult at first. (Or) that which is certain 205996 must come to pass, however hard it might seem at first.

205997
205998 55. They saw the system of the universe, laid naked to their sight, as 205999 the bold navigator beholds a world exposed to his view beyond the wide 206000 expanse of waters.

206001
206002 56. They saw the watery expanse to be ten times greater than the earth, 206003 and enveloping it in the shape of the crust of the walnut fruit.

206004
206005 57. Then there is a latent heat which is ten times as great as the water, and the circumambient air which is as much greater than the water; and then the all encompassing vacuum of which there is no end.

58. There is no beginning, middle or end of that infinite space; and it is productive of nothing, like a barren woman of her offspring.

59. It is only an extended expanse, infinite, calm and without beginning, middle or end, and is situated in the Supreme spirit.

60. Its immensity is as immeasurable as if a stone is flung with full force from its top, or if the phœnix would fly up to it with all his might, or if he would traverse through it in full velocity, it is impossible for him to reach from one end to the other, in a whole Kalpa age.

CHAPTER XXX.

DESCRIPTION OF THE MUNDANE EGG—(BRAHMÁNDA).

They passed in a moment beyond the regions of the earth, air, fire, water, and vacuum, and the tracks of the ten planetary spheres.

2. They reached the boundless space, whence the universe appeared as an egg (ovum).

3. They beheld under its vault millions of luminous particles floating in the air (nebulæ).

4. These were as innumerable bubbles, floating on the waters of the unlimited ocean of the sphere of the Intellect.

5. Some of them were going downward, and others rising upward; some turning round, and others appeared to their understanding to remain fixed and immovable.

6. These different motions appeared to them with respect to their own situations, as they saw them in their different sides.

7. Here there were no ups and downs and no upside or below, nor any going forward or backward. Here there are no such directions as men take to be by the position of their bodies.

8. There is but one indefinite space in nature, as there is but one consciousness in all beings; yet everything moves in its own way, as wayward boys take their own course.

9. Ráma said:—Tell me sir, why do we call upward and downward, forward and backward, if there are no such things in space and nature.

10. Vasishtha said:—There is but one space enveloping all things, and the worlds which are seen in the infinite and indiscernible womb of vacuity, are as worms moving on the surface of water.

11. All these bodies that move about in the world by their want of freedom (_i.e._ by the power of attraction), are thought to be up and down by our position on earth.

12. So when there is a number of ants on an earthen ball, all its sides are reckoned below which are under their feet, and those as above which are over their backs.

13. Such is this ball of the earth in one of these worlds, covered by vegetables and animals moving on it, and by devas, demons and men walking upon it.

14. It is covered also by cities, towns and mountains, and their inhabitants and productions, like the walnut by its coat.
15. Like elephants appearing as pigmies in the Vindhyan mountains, do these worlds appear as particles in the vast expanse of space.
16. Every thing that is any where, is produced from and subsists in space. It is always all in all things, which are contained as particles in it.
17. Such is the pure vacuous space of the Divine understanding, that like an ocean of light, contains these innumerable worlds, which like the countless waves of the sea, are revolving for ever in it.
18. Some of these are hollow within, and others as dark as the darkness in the end of a _kalpa_ age: and they are all moving about in the ocean of vacuity, like the waves of the sea.
19. Some of these are whirling about with a jarring noise for ever, which is neither heard by nor known to any body. It is like the motion of men addicted to earthly pursuits by their nature.
20. Some of these are now growing in form, as if they were newly created, and are in the course of their development, like sprouts in the cells of seeds newly sown in the ground.
21. Some of these are melting away as icicles under heat, like the mountains that were melted down by the burning sun and heavenly fire, at the dissolution of the world.
22. Others have been continually falling downward without gaining the ground, till at last they dwindle away, and melt into the divine Intellect.
23. Others are as immovable in the air, as the animalculae in the water, which are moved to and fro by the wind, without any sign of motion or sensation in them.
24. Again nothing is stable in nature, but every thing is as changeful as the acts and usages enjoined in the Vedas and sástras, are altered and succeeded by others.
25. There are other Brahmás and other patriarchs, and many Vishnus and many Indras one after the other. We have different kings of men, and sometimes no ruler of them.
26. Some are as men and lords of others (Ishas), in this multiform creation, and some are creeping and crooked living beings on earth; some kinds are as full as the waters of the ocean, and others have become quite extinct in the world.
27. Some are as hard as solid stones, and others as soft as the poor insects and worms; some are of godly figures as the giants, and others of puny human forms.
28. Some are quite blind and suited to darkness (as owls and moles and bats); others are suited to light (as men, birds and beasts), and some to both (as cats and rats).
29. Some are born as gnats sucking the juice of the fruits of the fig tree; while others are empty within, and fly about and feed upon the air.
30. The world is thus filled with creatures beyond the conception of Yogis, and we can not form even a guess-work of the beings that fill the infinite vacuum.
31. This world is the sphere of these living beings; but the great vacuum spreading beyond it, is so extensive, that it is immeasurable by the gods Vishnu and others, were they to traverse through it, for the whole of their lives.

32. Every one of these etherial globes, is encircled by a belt resembling a golden bracelet; and has an attractive power like the earth to attract other objects.

33. I have told you all about the grandeur of the universe to my best knowledge, any thing beyond this, is what I have no knowledge of, nor power to describe. 34. There are many other large worlds, rolling through the immense space of vacuum, as the giddy goblins of Yakshas revel about in the dark and dismal deserts and forests, unseen by others.

CHAPTER XXXI.

SECTION I.

ALIGHTING OF THE LADIES ON EARTH.

Vasishtha said:—After having seen the worlds in their aerial journey, the ladies alighted from there, and quickly entered the inner apartment of the king.

2. There they saw the dead body of the king lying in state amidst heaps of flowers, accompanied by the spiritual body of Lílá, sitting beside the corpse.

3. It was the dead of night, and the inmates had fallen into sound sleep one by one; and the room was perfumed with the incense of resin, camphor and sandalwood and saffron.

4. Lílá, seeing the house of her latter husband, and wishing to enter into it, alighted in her assumed body (sankalpadeha) on the spot of his sepulchre.

5. She then passed through the fictitious spacious palace of her lord (sankalpasansára), by breaking out of the confines of her body and cranium called the earthly and worldly environs in Yoga terminology (sansára and Brahmánda-ávaranas).

6. Then she went again with the goddess to the bright and spacious temple of the world (Brahmánda-mandapa), in which she quickly entered.

7. She saw her husband's imaginary world to lie as a dirty and mossy pool, as the lioness beholds the mountain cave covered by darkness and clouds.

8. The goddesses then entered into that vacuous world with their airy bodies, as weak ants make their passage through the hard crust of the wood-apple or bel-fruit.

9. There they passed through regions of cloudy hills and skies, and reached the surface of the earth, consisting of tracts of land and basins of water.

10. They then came to the Jambudwípa (Asia), situated amidst the ninefold petals of the other dwípas (or continents), and thence proceeded to the territories of Lílá's husband in the varsha land of Bharata (India).

11. At this interval of time they beheld a certain prince—(the ruler of Sinde), strengthened by other chiefs, making an attack on this part which was the beauty of the world.

- 206213 12. They beheld the air crowded by people of the three worlds, who had 206214 assembled there to see the conflict.
206215
- 206216 13. They remained undaunted, and saw the air crowded by aerial beings
206217 in groups like clouds.
206218
- 206219 14. There were the Siddhas, Cháranas, Gandharvas, Vidyádhara, Súra, 206220 celestials and Apsarás in large bodies.
206221
- 206222 15. There were also the goblins of Bhútas and Pisáchas, and Rákshasa 206223 cannibals; while the Vidyádhara females were flinging handfuls of 206224 flowers like showers of rain on the combatants.
206225
- 206226 16. The Vetálas, Yakshas and Kushmánds, that were looking at the affray 206227 with pleasure, took themselves to the shelter of hills, to avoid the 206228 flying darts and weapons.
206229
- 206230 17. The imps were flying from the air, to keep themselves from the way 206231 of the flying weapons; and the spectators were excited by sound of the 206232 war-whoop of the combatants.
206233
- 206234 18. Lílá who was standing by with a flapper (or fan) in her hand, was 206235 frightened at the imminent dreadful conflict, and smiled to scorn their 206236 mutual vauntings.
206237

206238 SECTION II.

206239 SIGHT OF A BATTLE ARRAY IN EARTH AND AIR.

- 206240
- 206241
- 206242
- 206243 19. Virtuous people who were unable to endure the horrid sight, betook 206244 themselves to prayers, with the chief priests for averting the calamity.
206245
- 206246 20. The messengers of Indra, were ready with their decorated elephants
206247 (called _loka-pálas_), for bearing the souls of mighty heroes to grace 206248 the seats of heaven.
206249
- 206250 21. The cháranas and Gandharvas, were singing praises of the advancing 206251 heroes; and heavenly nymphs that liked heroism, were glancing at the 206252 best combatants.
206253
- 206254 22. Voluptuous women were wishing to embrace the arms of the brave;
206255 and the fair fame of the heroes, had turned the hot sunshine to cool
206256 moonlight.
206257
- 206258 23. Ráma asked:—Tell me, sir, what sort of a warrior is called a hero, 206259 that becomes a jewel in heaven, and who is an insurgent.
206260
- 206261 24. Vasishtha answered:—He who engages in a lawful warfare, and fights
206262 for his king, and whether he dies or becomes victorious in the field, 206263 is called a hero, and goes to heaven.
206264
- 206265 25. Whoever kills men otherwise in war and dies afterwards, in an 206266 unjust cause, is called an insurgent, and goes to hell at last.
206267
- 206268 26. Whoever fights for unlawful property, and dies in battle, becomes 206269 subject to everlasting hell fire.
206270
- 206271 27. Whoso wages a just warfare, that is justified by law and usage, 206272 that warrior is called both loyal as well as heroic in deed.
206273
- 206274 28. Whoever dies in war, for the preservation of kine, Bráhmans and 206275 friends with a willing mind, and whoso protects his guest and refugee 206276 with all diligence, he verily becomes an ornament in heaven after his 206277 death.
206278
- 206279 29. The king who is steadfast in protecting his subjects and his own 206280 country, is called the just, and those that die in his cause are called 206281 the brave.

- 206282
206283 30. They that die fighting on the side of riotous subjects, or in the 206284 cause of rebellious princes or chiefs, are doomed to fire.
206285
206286 31. They that die fighting unjustly against their kings, lawgivers and 206287 rulers, are subjected to the torments of hell.
206288
206289 32. A war which is just, serves to establish order; but the giddy that 206290 are fearless of the future, destroy all order (by their unjust warfare).
206291
206292 33. The hero dying, goes to heaven, is the common saying; and the 206293 sástras call the lawful warrior only a hero, and not otherwise.
206294
206295 34. They who suffer wounds on their bodies, for the protection of the 206296 righteous and good, are said to be heroes, or else they are insurgents 206297 (_dimbhavas_).
206298
206299 35. It was in expectation of seeing such heroes that the damsels of the 206300 gods, were standing in the air, and talking to themselves of becoming 206301 the spouses of such warriors.
206302
206303 36. The air was as decorated as by an illumination on high, and by rows 206304 of the beautiful heavenly cars of gods and Siddhas, and presence of 206305 celestial maidens, who sang in sweet notes, and decorated their locks
206306 with _mandára_ flowers.
206307
206308
206309
206310

206311 CHAPTER XXXII.

206312
206313 ONSET OF THE WAR.
206314

206315 Vasishtha said:—Lílá standing with the goddess of wisdom in air, saw 206316 the Apsarás dancing there, at the eagerness of the combatants for war 206317 below.
206318

206319 2. She beheld the assemblage of the forces in her own territory once 206320 governed by her lord; and saw the field of the air not less formidable 206321 by the assembled ghosts (and its encircling belt composed of the lion, 206322 scorpion, crab and the archer).
206323

206324 3. The meeting of the two forces made the ground appear as a billowy 206325 sea; like the meeting of two clouds in the sky, giving it the 206326 appearance of two hostile forces.
206327

206328 4. The battle array of armoured warriors, flashing as the fire of 206329 heaven, was succeeded by their commingled blows, resembling the 206330 rattling of thunders above, deafening the ears and dazzling the sight.
206331

206332 5. Then darts and javelins, spears and lances, and many other missiles
206333 (_prásas_) began to fall on both sides, like showers of raindrops, 206334 hailstones and meteorolites from the skies.
206335

206336 6. Showers of shafts fell with a force, that would pierce the pinions 206337 of _garuda_, and struck out the glare of sunbeams, by hitting at the 206338 armours of the warriors.
206339

206340 7. The combatants standing face to face with their lifted arms, and 206341 staring at each other with steadfast looks, seemed as they were 206342 pictures in a painting.
206343

206344 8. The armies drawn in long regiments, standing in lines opposite to 206345 each other, were heard to answer one another by their repeated shouts.
206346

206347 9. The battalia of both armies, and the drums on both sides, were put 206348 to a stop by the warnings of their leaders, against striking the first 206349 blow.
206350

10. The intermediate space of the breadth of two bows, that separated the hostile forces like a bridge from one another, appeared as the gap, caused by the winds in the midst of the ocean at the universal deluge. (Or more like the partition of the waters of the Red sea by the rod of Moses).
11. The leaders were drowned in thoughts for fear of bloodshed and massacre; and the cowardly soldiers groaned in their hearts, with the hoarse noise of croaking frogs.
12. There were numbers of braves, eager to yield up their precious lives in a trice; and the bowyers stood with their bowstrings drawn to the ear, and ready to let loose their pointed arrows at the foe.
13. Others stood dreadfully fixed to strike their arms upon the enemy, and many were looking sternly at their adversaries, with their frowning looks.
14. The armours were clashing by mutual concussion, the countenances of the braves were burning with rage, and the faces of cowards were turned towards sheltered retreats for flight.
15. The lookers stood in doubt of their lives until the end of the war, and old men like big elephants, were covered with horripilation on their bodies.
16. The silence which ensued at the expectation of the first blow, resembled the calm of the stormy main, and the deep sleep of a city at the dead of night.
17. The musical instruments, the drum and conch-shell were all silent, and a thick cloud of dust, covered the face of the earth and sky.
18. The retreaters were flying from their stronger assailants, who kept running after them, in the manner of sharks pursuing the shoals of fishes in the sea.
19. The glittering fringes of the flags, put the etherial stars to blush, and the lifted goads in the hands of the elephant-drivers, made a forest of tapering trees in the sky.
20. The flinging arrows were flying like flocks of the winged tribe in air, and the loud beating of drums and blowing of pipes, resounded amidst the air.
21. There was a phalanx in a circular form, attacking a host of wicked demons, and here was a squadron in the form of Garuda, with its right and left wings, attacking a body of elephants.
22. Somewhere a great howling was heard to rise from the vanguard of a body of troops, disconcerted by a cohort in the form of eagles: and at another many were seen to fall upon one another with mutual shouts.
23. Thus a tremendous noise was raised by the warriors of the many legions, and a multitude of big mallets were seen to be raised on high by the hands of the combatants.
24. The glaring of sable steel, shaded the sunbeams like a cloud, and hissing darts in the air, emitted a sound, resembling the rustling of breeze amidst the dry leaves of trees.
25. Now the brunt of battle, began like the dashing of clouds upon clouds at the end of a Kalpa, and the war raged like the raging sea ruffled by a hurricane.
26. Big elephants were falling in the field like coal-black rocks, hurled down by gusts of wind.

206420 27. It seemed that the infernal spirits were let loose from their caves
206421 of hell, to rage in the battle field with their horrid and dismal 206422 figures.

206423
206424 28. The day light was obscured by the sable cloud of swords, and the 206425 mallets and lances were raised up by the black Kunta warriors, who 206426 seemed bent upon converting the earth to an ocean of bloodshed.
206427

206431 CHAPTER XXXIII.[17]
206432

206433 COMINGLED FIGHTING.
206434
206435

206436 Ráma said:—Sir, relate to me in short and promptly, about this 206437 warfare, as my ears are delighted with narratives of this kind.
206438

206439 2. Vasishtha said:—These ladies then, in order to have a better view 206440 of the battle below, ascended in their imaginary aerial cars _vimána_, 206441 to a more retired spot in the higher regions of the sky.
206442

206443 3. At this interval, there began a mingled fight of the forces face to 206444 face, with a commingled shout of the two armies, as the dashing of the 206445 waves against one another in the raging sea.
206446

206447 4. At this instant, Vidúratha the lord of the realm, (formerly 206448 Padma—the husband of Lílá), seeing a daring warrior of the hostile
206449 force attack one of his soldiers, struck him impatiently on the breast, 206450 with the blow of a ponderous mallet.
206451

206452 5. Then the battle raged with the impetuosity of the rolling waves of 206453 the stormy main, and the arms on both sides, flamed with living fire
206454 and flash of fiery lightnings.
206455

206456 6. Now the edges of waving swords (larattarat), glittered in the sky, 206457 and cracking and clashing noise (Kanakana), filled the air with a 206458 hideous crackling (kadmada).
206459

206460 7. Then flew the winged arrows, overshadowing the beams of the sun, and 206461 emitting a booming noise (hunkára), which hushed the rattling clamour
206462 (gharghara) of summer clouds.
206463

206464 8. Armours clashed against armours (Kankata), with a clanking noise
206465 (tankára), and shot forth the sparks of glistening fire (Kankana);
206466 and arms, hashing (ch'hina-bhinna) and slashing (Khanda-khanda)
206467 against arms, filled the air with their fragments flying like birds in 206468 the air.
206469

206470 9. The shaking (dodulya) shanks and arms of the army, appeared as a 206471 moving forest (dordruma) on the land, and the twangings of their bows
206472 (tankára), and rumbling of the disks (krenkára), drove away the birds 206473 of the air, and crackled like the rattling drive of wheels (dravat) in 206474 heaven.
206475

206476 10. The hissing of their loosened strings (halhala), resembled the 206477 (ghunghuna) buzzing of bees, heard in the _samádhi_ yoga (by shutting 206478 the ears).
206479

206480 11. Iron shafts like sleets of hailstones, pierced the heads of the 206481 soldiers, and the (ranat) crashing of armours (sanghatta), broke the 206482 arms of the warriors in mail (Kankata sankata).
206483

206484 12. Weapons struck on brazen armours with a howling noise (hunkára), 206485 made a clanking sound by the stroke (tánkára), and flying like drifts
206486 of rain water (tartara), pierced the face of the air on all sides:
206487 (literally, denticulated—dantura dingmukha).
206488

13. The striking of steel on one another (sanghatta), made the hands ring with a jingling sound (jhanjhanat); and the continued rapping on the arms (ásphota), and clapping of hands, (karasphota), raised a pattering and chattering sound (chat chat and pat pat).

14. The whizzing noise of unsheathing the sword (shitkára), and the hissing of the sparks of fire (sansana); the flinging of arrows in all ways (sadatkára), and the flying of darts, likened the rustling of falling leaves (Kharkhara) in autumn.

15. The spouting of life blood (dhakdhak), from the throats separated from the bodies, the mangled limbs and heads, and the broken swords filled the whole space.

16. The flame of fire flaring (sphurat) from the armours; emblazoned the hairs of the warriors, and the fighting and falling (ranatpatat) of swordsmen, raised a giddy and loud jingling of their weapons (jhanjhana).

17. The lofty elephants pierced by the spears of the Kunta lancers, poured out torrents of red-hot blood; while the tusky tribe was goring whole bodies of them with their shrill cries (chitkára).

18. Others crushed by the ponderous maces of their antagonists, creaked grievously under the blows; while the heads of the slain soldiers, swam in the rivers of blood over the plain.

19. Here the hungry vultures were pouncing from above, and there the sky was covered by a cloud of dust; and the weaponless combatants, were engaged in Kesákesí fighting, by holding each other down by the hairs.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

DESCRIPTION OF THE BATTLE.

Now the generals and ministers of the belligerent powers, and the aerial spectators of the war, were thus talking among themselves.

2. Lo! here the ground has become a lake of blood, with the heads of the slaughtered hosts floating as lotuses upon it; and there the air has become as the starry heaven, glittering with broken weapons, flying like birds in the sky.

3. Behold the air is reddened with the particles of vermeil blood, borne above by the winds, and the sky presenting the evening clouds, with the glow of the setting sun at midday.

4. What are these, says one, that are flying as straws in the firmament? They are, says the other, no straws, but the flight of arrows, that have filled the atmosphere.

5. As long as the dust of the earth, cries another, is moistened by the bloodshed of the brave, so long are the heroes entitled to glory, and have their abode in heaven for myriads of years.[18]

6. Fear not these sable swords, says the sástra, whose blades are worn by the brave like petals of blue lotuses about their necks and breasts; and bravoës are favourites in the eyes of the goddess of fortune. (Fortune favours the brave).

7. The heavenly nymphs that beheld the fighting, felt a desire to embrace the brave, and the god of the flowery bow (Káma or Cupid), was busy to loosen their waist bands. (Cupid by inversion is Dípuc, another name of the Indian Káma. And Fairies or Paries and Huries are said to 206558 fall to the lot of the fighters in Jihad-battle. So says Dryden: "None 206559 but the brave deserve the fair").

206560
206561 8. They beckoned their welcome by the waving of their reddish palms, in 206562 the shaking of the ruddy leaves of trees, and by the round glances of 206563 their eyes, in the blooming blossoms of plants, and by the perfume of 206564 their breath in the honied fragrance of flowers.

206565
206566 9. The geniuses of the garden of Paradise, were singing sweetly in the 206567 notes of the sylvan choir, and betook themselves to dancing in the 206568 wagging tails of peacocks.

206569
206570 10. As the brave warrior was breaking the line of the enemy with his 206571 hardy axe; so was his beloved breaking his hard heart and spirit, with 206572 the soft glances of her eyes.

206574 11. It is by my lance, says the lancer, that I have severed the head of 206575 my adversary with the rings in his ears, like the head of the ascending
206576 node of Ráhu, approaching the disk of the sun.

206577
206578 12. Lo! There is a champion, hurling the blocks of stones, attached to 206579 the end of a chain reaching his feet; and another whirling his wheel
206580 with a wondrous log of wood, held in his uplifted arm.

206581
206582 13. There comes that combatant in the form of Yama, appearing from the 206583 region of Pluto (Preta), and spreading a horrid devastation all around.
206584 Come let us go hence as we came.

206585
206586 14. Look there the ravenous birds, greedily plunging their long necks
206587 in the cells of bodies just separated from their heads, and glutting 206588 themselves with the gushing blood; and see there the headless trunk of 206589 the slain, moving to and fro in the field of battle.

206590
206591 15. The eloquent among the spectators were talking to one another, 206592 about the frailty of human life, and the uncertainty of the time of 206593 their meeting in the next world.

206594
206595 16. Oh! the stern cannibal of death, says one, that devours in one 206596 swoop, whole bodies of the assembled armies, now weltering in blood;
206597 and levels the levelling hosts to the ground.

206598
206599 17. The showers of arrows falling on the bodies of elephants, resemble 206600 the showers of rain drops on mountain tops; and the darts sticking to 206601 their frontal bones, liken the bolts of lightening piercing the peaks 206602 of cliffs.

206603
206604 18. While the headless body of the beheaded, was groveling grievously
206605 on the ground for want of its head, the pate flying on high as a bird 206606 of air, proclaimed its immortality in heaven.

206607
206608 19. The army harassed by stones slung on their heads, cried to entrap
206609 the enemy in the snares set at their feet.

206610
206611 20. Wives that had become Apsarás (heavenly nymphs) after death, were 206612 now eager to claim their husbands, who were restored to their youth, by 206613 virtue of their falling in the field of battle.

206614
206615 21. The glaring light of the line of lances that had reached the skies, 206616 seemed as a flight of stairs or golden vistas, for the ascent of the 206617 brave to the gates of heaven.

206618
206619 22. The wife of the slain soldier, seeing now a heavenly goddess, 206620 taking possession of her husband's fair gold-like breast, was looking 206621 about in search of another.

206622
206623 23. Generals, wailing loudly with their uplifted arms, over their 206624 fallen armies in the field, appeared as the cliffs of rocks, resounding 206625 to the clamorous surges below.

206626

24. They cried out to fight the foremost in war, and to remove the wounded to the rear; and not to trample over the bodies of their own soldiers, now lying low on the ground.
25. Behold! there the Apsarás eagerly tying their loosened locks, and advancing with sobbing bosoms to receive the departed warriors, joining their company in their celestial forms.
26. Ah! receive them says one, who are our guests from afar, on the banks of the rivers of Paradise, decorated with lotus blossoms of golden hue, and entertain them with fresh water and cooling breeze.
27. Look! there the groups of weapons, broken into pieces like bones by their concussion, are huddled in the air with a jingling sound (kanatkára), and shining as stars in the sky.
28. Lo! the stream of deceased souls, flowing in arrowy currents and rolling in whirlpools of the flying disks, is rapidly gliding with the pebbles and stones, flung from the slings in the air.
29. The sky is become as a lake of lotuses with the lotiform heads of warriors flung aloft in the air, while the flying weapons are floating like their stalks in it, with the broken swords as their thorns all around.
30. The flying fragments of the flags, forming the folia of the plants, and the darts sticking to them, appear as big black bees fluttering about the flowers moving with the breeze.
31. The arrows sticking to the dead bodies of elephants, are as emmets on mountain tops, and as timid girls clinging to the bosoms of men.
32. The winds unfurling the curling locks of Vidyádhara females, indicate their approaching spousals, as the unfolding plumage of fowls are predictions of success in augury.
33. The lifted umbrellas are shining as so many moons on high and the moon shining above in the form of fair fame, spreads her light as a white canopy on earth.
34. The brave warrior, soon after his death, assumes a celestial form framed by his own merit, as a man in his sleep, attains to a state, he has imagined to himself in his waking.
35. The flying spears and lances and clubs and disks are hurtling in the air, like shoals of restless fishes and sharks, moving about incessantly in the troubled waters of the sea.
36. The milk-white rags of umbrellas, tattered and shattered by arrowy shafts, are flying as cranes in the crowded air, and appearing as the disk of the moon broken into a thousand pieces.
37. These waving flappers flying in the air with a hoarse gurgling (gharghara), seem as the waves of the sea lifted in the air, and undulating with a babbling noise in the ocean of the sky.
38. Those slips of the flappers and umbrellas, hashed by the slashing arms, appear as the laurels of glory flung aloft and flying in the regions of air.
39. Behold ye friends! how these flying arrows and showering spears, are approaching to us with hits of their spoil, like bodies of locusts, bearing away their verdant booty in the air.
40. Hearken to the clanking sound of the striking steel, in the uplifted arm of the armoured soldier, resounding like the loud larum of the regent of death.
41. Hear the tremendous blows of weapons, like the blowing of an all destroying tornado, throwing down the elephants like craigs of mountains, with their long stretching tusks lying like water falls on the ground.

42. Lo! there the drivers of war chariots are stopped in their course, and striving to make their way through the puddles of blood, in which the wheels and horses of the car, are huddled together as in a bog of quagmire.

43. The jingling of arms and armours, and the jangling of swords and steel, resound, as the tinkling of the lute at the dancing of the dire and dreaded dame of death.

44. See the skirts of the sky reddened by the roseate particles, borne by the winds from the streams of blood, issuing out of the wounds in the bodies of men, horses and elephants lying dead in the field.

45. Look at the array of arrows formed in the air as a wreath of blossoms, and falling as the rays of lightnings from the dark black clouds of weapons hanging on high.

46. Lo! the surface of the earth filled with blood-red weapons, appearing as faggots of fire strewn over the ground in an universal conflagration.

47. The multitudes of commingled weapons, clashing with and breaking one another into pieces, are falling down in showers, like the innumerable rays of the sun.

48. The fighting of one man among the motionless many, is like the magic play of a magician[19] where the conjurer acts his parts amidst the bewitched beholders, Lo! there the indifferent spectators viewing the warfare as a dream (by their _prajna_ or inward vision of the mind).

49. The field of battle, where all other sounds are hushed under the clashing of arms, resembles the stage of the martial god Bhairava, chanting his pitiless war song in jarring cacophony.

50. The battlefield is turned to a sea of blood, filled with the sands of pounded weapons, and rolling with the waves of broken discuses.

51. All the quarters under the regents of the sky, are filled with martial music loudly resounding on all sides; and the rebelling hills seem to challenge one another, in their aerial flight and fighting (as in contest of the gods and titans of old).

52. Alas for shame! says one, that these arrows flung with such force from the bow strings, and flying with such loud hissing, and glittering as red hot lightnings in the air, are foiled in their aim of piercing the impenetrable armours, and driven back by them to hit at the stony hills.

53. Hear me friend, that art tired with the sight, that it is time for us to depart from this place, ere we are pierced in our bodies by these sharp arrows flashing as fire, and before the day runs its course of the fourth watch (evening).

CHAPTER XXXV.

DESCRIPTION OF THE BATTLEFIELD.[20]

Vasishtha said:—Then the waves of horse troops mounting to the sky, made the battlefield appear as a raging sea.

2. The moving umbrellas floated as its foam and froth, and the 206765 feathered silvery arrows glided like the finny pearly fishes in it, 206766 while the high flight and rush of the cavalry, heaved and dashed as 206767 surges of the sea.

206768
206769 3. The rushing of the weapons resembled the running of its currents, 206770 and the circles of the soldiers were as vortices of its waters. The 206771 elephants were as its islets and their motions resembled the moving 206772 rocks in it.

206773
206774 4. The whirling disks were as its eddies, and the flying hairs on the 206775 heads likened its floating weeds. The sparkling sands were as its 206776 shining waters, and the flash of swords like its glassy spray.

206777
206778 5. The gigantic warriors were its whales and alligators, and the 206779 resounding caverns like its gurgling whirlpools.

206780
206781 6. The flying arrows were like its swimming fishes, and the floating 206782 flags likened its uprising waves and bores.

206783
206784 7. The shining weapons formed the waters of this ocean and their 206785 whirlpools also, while the long lines of forces appeared as the huge 206786 and horrible bodies of its whales.

206787
206788 8. Soldiers clad in black iron armour, were as the dark blue waters of 206789 the deep, and the headless bodies groveling in dust were as the eddies 206790 of the sea, with the encircled equipments as the sea weeds.

206791
206792 9. The showers of arrows had obscured the skies with a mist, and the 206793 confused rattlings of the battlefield, were as the roarings of the 206794 clouds.

206795
206796 10. The flying and falling heads of the slain soldiers, resembled the 206797 large drops of rain, and their bodies were as pieces of wood, whirling 206798 in the eddies of the disks.

206799
206800 11. The bold bowyer, bending his strong bow in the form of a curve, 206801 and leaping above the ground, resembled the spouting sea, rising from 206802 underneath the ground with his heaving waves on high.

206803
206804 12. The unnumbered umbrellas and flags, that were moving up and down in 206805 the field, were as the foaming and frothing sea, rolling in waves of 206806 blood, and carrying away the beams and timbers of the broken cars in 206807 its current.

206808
206809 13. The march of the army resembled the flowing of the sea waters, 206810 and the blood spouting from the wounds of the elephants likened its 206811 bubbles, while the moving horses and elephants represented the sea
206812 animals in their motion.

206813
206814 14. The battlefield had become like the wondrous field of the air,
206815 where the furious war, like a tremendous earthquake, shook the hills
206816 like moving clouds in the sky.

206818 15. Here the waves were undulating like flights of birds in the air, 206819 and the groups of elephants falling aground like rocks, and the 206820 cowardly ranks were murmuring like herds of the timorous deer.

206821
206822 16. The field is turned to a forest of arrows, and wounded soldiers 206823 are standing fixed on the ground as trees, with the arrows flying as 206824 locusts, and the horses moving like antelopes in it.

206825
206826 17. Here the loud drum sounded as the humming of bees in the hollows
206827 of trees, and the army appearing as a mist, with the bold warrior
206828 sprawling like a lion in it.

206829
206830 18. The dust was rising in clouds and the forces falling as rocks; the 206831 huge cars broken down as hills, and the flaming swords shining on all 206832 sides.

206833

19. The rise and fall of the foot soldier's feet flitted like the falling flowers on the ground, and the flags and umbrellas o'ertopped it as clouds; it was overflowed by streams of blood, and the high-sounding elephants falling as thundering showers of rain.

20. The war was as the last doom of death ready to devour the world, and destroy the flags and banners, the umbrellas and chariots in a confused chaos.

21. The shining weapons were falling like fragments of the refulgent sun, and burning all things as a burning pain inflames the soul and mind.

22. The out-stretched bows were as rainbows, and the falling arrows as showers of rain; the flying sabres resembled the forky lightnings, and their falling fragments like the sparkling hailstones.

23. The dire massacre made a sea of blood, with the hurling stones as its shoals and rocks; while the flying arms resembled the falling stars from heaven.

24. The sky was as a sea full of the whirlpools of the groups of disks and circlets, that were hurled in the air; and there were the burning fires, that performed the funerals of the slain.

25. The missiles were as bolts of thunder, which struck the rock-like elephants dead in the field, to block the passage of men.

26. The earth and sky were obscured by a thick cloud of showering arrows, and the army below was a sea of tempestuous warfare and bloodshed.

27. The destructive weapons were flying on all sides, like huge dragons of the sea, carried aloft by gusts of wind from the stormy main.

28. The flying arms of bolts and swords, disks, pikes and lances, were blazing and breaking one another in the air with such hideous noise, that it seemed to be a second deluge, when the last tornado blew up everything on high scattering them in all directions, and crushing and smashing them with a tremendous peal.

CHAPTER XXXVI.

SECTION I.

COLLISION OF EQUAL ARMS AND ARMIGERENTS.

The heaps of arrows rising in spires above the ground, drove the cowards and the wounded afar from the field.

2. The hills of the dead bodies of men, horses and elephants, heaving in promiscuous heaps, and appearing as clouds fallen upon earth, invited the Yakshas and Rákshasas, and the carnivorous Pisáchas, to come and sport in the wide ocean of blood.

3. Now there commenced a commutual contest, betwixt men of rank and virtue, and those of good character, valour and strength on both sides; not excepting even the holy and household people, all of whom took part in the combat (that is, no condition of life, nor age nor sex, could escape the contagion of a warfare).

4. Duels were fought between these, like the clashing of one cloud with another; and like the confluence of two streams discharging their fury against each other.

5. As a rib is joined to another, and one side with the other, so met the horse against the horse, and elephant opposed the elephant in mutual conflict.
6. As one forest clasps and clings to another, and one hill is linked with the other in a range, so the duelists strove together, as one wave dashes against the other.
7. Footmen fought with footmen, as the reeds crush the reeds, and bamboos clash against one another, and the contrary winds struggle between themselves.
8. Cars falling upon cars, and chariots running against chariots, broke one another to pieces; and the citizens beat the rustics, as the Devas smote the demons of old.
9. The sky which had been erewhile clouded by the flight of arrows, was now emblazoned by the banner of the bowyer, resembling the rainbow of various colours.
10. At last the warriors who were overpowered in their conflict with unequal arms, fled away from the field, as they do from the fire of a conflagration.
11. Now the armigerents with discuses, met the thwarters of disks (chakras) in contest; and bowyers were opposed to bowmen, and swordsmen challenged the sword fighters in the field. So met the hookers and crookers with their co-rivals with crowbars (bhusundis) in hand.
12. Maces were opposed to maces (musalas), and lancers were set against the lance bearers (kuntas) in fighting. Spearmen braved the spearmen (rishtis), and the throwers of missiles were crossed with missives (prásas) in hand.
13. Mallets militated against mallets (mudguras), and clubs were contravened by clubmen in the conflict. Combatants with pikes (saktis), encountered the pikemen (sakti-dharas) face to face; and iron rods were crossed to pointed rods (súlas) in the strife.
14. Pugilists with missive weapons, counteracted the missiles of their antagonists (prásas), and those fighting with battle axes (parasus), baffled the poleaxes and pickaxes (paraswadhas) of their foes.
15. Trappers with their traps and snares, attacked the darters of nooses and lassos (pásas); and the darters of javelins (sankus), withstood the darts of the dartsmen on the other side. Daggers were opposed to daggers (kshurikas), and cudgels were presented before the cudgels (bhindipálas of the enemy).
16. Combatants with iron gloves contravened the boxers with iron fistcuffs (Vajramushtis), and those with iron cranes, pursued the fighters with crooked goads (ankusas) in hand. Warriors with ploughshares attacked the ploughmen, and those with tridents, fell upon the trident holders (trisúlins) in contest.
17. Champions with chained armours set upon the soldiers attired in mail (srinkhala jála); and they poured upon the field as flights of locusts, or as the waves in the troubled sea.
18. The air also seemed as a sea, with flying disks whirling as whirlpools (chakravartas), and the flight of reeds whistling like gusts of wind; while the range of running weapons seemed as sharks and dolphins moving about it.
19. The hollow of the heaven became as the great deep of the sea, impassable by the celestials, owing to the waving weapons, moving as sea monsters in the air.
20. Thus the armies of the two belligerent potentates, each composed of eight ranks or battalions, were furiously engaged with one another, as described below.

SECTION II.

CATALOGUE OF THE FORCES.

21. Now hear me relate to you, the forces on the side of Padma, now named Vidúratha, and the allied powers that came to his side, from the Central and Eastern districts.

22. There came the hardy warriors of Kosala (Oudh) and Kási (Benares); those of Magadha (Behar) and Utkala (Orissa), situated in the east; and the Mekhalas (of Vindhya range), the Karkars (of Karnatic), and the Madras (of Madura) in the south.

23. The chiefs of Hema (Imaus) and Rudras and the Támraliptas (Tamils) from the south; the Prágjyotishas (of east Assam), and the horse faced Osmuks and Ambashtha cannibals.

24. Then there joined the Varna-koshthas and Viswotras, and the eaters of raw food and flesh and the fish eaters (piscivori); and those with faces like tigers, the Kiratas (Kirrroids and Kira-antis), with the Sauviras and one legged people.

25. Next came the mountaineers of Mályavána, Sibira and Anjanagiri; and others having the ensigns of bulls and lotuses, and the people of the sun rising mountain (Udaya-giri) in the east.

26. Those that joined from the south east (prágdaxina), are the following, namely; the Vindhyaris, the Chedis, the Vatsas, the Dasárnas (near the confluence of the ten streams); and the Angas, Bangas and Upabangas (of Upper and Lower Bengal).

27. They that met from the south were, Kalingas and Pundras, the Jatharas, Vidarbhas and the hill people (on the Karnatic coast); the Sabaras, the outcasted savages, the Karnas and the Tripura people.

28. Those named Kantakas from their thorny district, the unenlightened Komalas (of Comilla?); the Karnas (Canarese), the Ándhras, the Cholas and the people on the borders of the Charmanvati river.

29. The Kakos or bald-headed and bearded people, and those of the Hema-kuta hills; the frizzled and long necked people, and the inhabitants of Kishkindha and cocoa forests.

30. The princes that joined with Lílá's husband from the south, were as follows viz. the Vindhyans, the Kusumians (of Patna), the Mahendras and the Darduras (of the hills of the same names).

31. The Malays and the solar race, and the Prince of the (33) united states and the rich and united cities of Avanti and Sámavati.

32. And those of Dasapura (or ten cities) of Katha (Kota), Chakra, Reshika Cutch and others, and the foresters of Upagiri and Bhadrágiri hills.

33. The prince of Nagore and the chiefs of Dandaka forest, and the joint states of the people; the Sahas, Saivas, and the hill people of the Rishyamuka and Karkota and the Vimbila foresters.

34. Then came the inhabitants from the banks of Pampá, the Kerakas and Karkaviras; with the Kherikas, Asikas and the people of Dhrumapattana.

35. Next came the Kásikas and Khallukas, the Yadas and Tamraparnikas; the Gonardas, the Kanakas and the people of Dinapattam.

36. The Tamris (Tamils), Kadambharas, Sahakáras and Enakas (or deer hunters); the Vaitundas, Tumba-vanalas, and those attired in deer and elephant skins.

37. Then came the lotus-like Sibis and Konkans and the inhabitants of Chitrakuta mountains; with the people of Karnata, the Mantas, Batakas and those of Cattak.

38. The Andhras and Kola hill people (Koles), the Avantis and Chedis; with the Chandas and Devanakas and Kraunchavahas.

39. At last came the people from the three peaks of Chitrakúta mountains, called the Silákhára, Nanda mardana and Malaya, which were the seats of the guardian Bákshasas of Lanká.

40. Then those of the southwest where there is the great realm of Surástra (Surat), with the kingdoms of Sindhu (Sinde) Sauvira, Abhíra, and Dravidas (in Deccan).

41. Also those of the districts of Kikata, Siddha Khanda, and Káliruha, and the mount Hemagiri or golden hills and the Raivataka range.

42. Then the warriors of Jaya Kachchha (the victorious Cutch), and Mayavara (Mewar); as also the Yavanas (Ionians), the Bahlikas (Balkhs), the Marganas (nomads), and the grey coloured Tumbas (on the north).

43. Then there came Lahsa races and many hill peoples, inhabiting the borders of the sea (Caspian), forming the limit of the dominion of Lílá's husband (Hindu Government) on the north.

44. Now know the names of the countries belonging to the enemy in the west, and of those composed of the following mountain ranges, _viz._

45. The mount Manimán and the Kurar-pana hills, with the hillocks of Vanorka, Megha-bhava, and the Chakra-vana mountain.

46. There is the country of the five peoples limiting the territory of the Kása Brahmans, and after that the Bháaraksha, the Páراكa and Sántika countries.

47. Thence stretch the countries of the Saivyas, Amarakas, the Pachchyas (Páschátayas) and Guhutwas; and then the Haihaya country, and those of the Suhyas, Gayas and Tajikas and Hunas (Huns).

48. Then along the side of some other countries, there is the range of Karka hills, inhabited by barbarous people, devoid of caste, customs and limits of moral duties.

49. Thence stretches a country hundreds of leagues in length, to the boundary mountain of Mahendra, abounding in rich stones and gems.

50. After that stands the Aswa range with hundreds of hills about it; and extending to the dread ocean on the north of the Pariyátra range. (Paropamisus).

51. On the north western side, there are countries beyond the boundary mountains (of Asia), where Venupati was the king of the land.

52. Then there are the countries of the Phálgunakas and Mándavayas and many other peoples; and those of Purukundas and Paras (Paris?) as bright as the orb of the sun.

53. Then the races of Vanmilas and Nalinas and the Dirghas; who are so called, from their tall statures and long arms and hairs. Then there are the Rangas (Red men), Stánikas with protuberant breasts, and the Guruhas and Chaluhas.

54. After that is the kingdom of women (ruled by a queen), where they feed upon bullocks and heifers. Now about the Himálayas and its hills in the north (of India):—

55. These are the Krauncha and Madhumán hills; and the Kailása, Vasumán and the Sumeru peaks; at the foot of which are the people, known under many names.

56. Beside these there met the warlike tribes of India consisting of the Madrawars, Malavas and Sura-senas. The Rajputs of the race of Arjuna, the Trigartas and the one legged people and Khudras.

57. There were the Abalas, Prakhalas, and Sakas (Saccæ or Scythians). The Khemadhúrtas, the Dasadhanas, the Gavásanas and Dandahanas (club fighters).

58. The Dhánadas and Sarakas and Bátadhánas also, with the islanders and Gándhāras and Avanti warriors of Malwa.

59. The warlike Takshasilas (Taxilas), the Bīlavas, Godhanas and the renowned warriors of Pushkara (Pokhra).

60. Then there were the Tíkshas and Kálavaras, and the inhabitants of the cities of Káhaka and Surabhúti likewise.

61. There were the people of the Ratikádarsa and Antarádarsa also; and the Pingalas, the Pandyas, Yamanas and Yátudhānas Rákshasas too.

62. There were also the races of men, known as Hematālas and Osmuks, together with the hilly tribes, inhabiting the Himalaya, Vasumán, Krauncha and Kailasa mountains.

63. Hear me now relate to you the peoples that came from the north east quarter, which extends a hundred and eighty leagues in its circumference.

64. There came also the Kalutas and Brahmaputras, the Kunidas and Khudinas, with the warlike Malavas and the champions of the Randhra and forest states.

65. Then there were the Kedavas and Sinhaputras of dwarfish statures; the Sabas (Sabæ or Sabians?), the Kaccæs, the Pahlavis (ancient Persians), the Kamiras and the Daradas (the present Darduis or Himalayan hills).

66. There were also the people of Abhisa, the Jarvakas, the Pulolas and Kuves; the Kirátas and Yamupatas, together with the poor and rich people of desert lands and tracts of gold.

67. Thus Lílá saw in one view, the residences of the devas; the forest lands and the earth in all their beauty. She saw all the seats of opulence (viswavasus), and the edifices with which they were adorned; she beheld the summit of Kailása, and the delightful groves at its foot, and the level lands traversed by the aerial cars of Vidyádhara and celestial beings.[21]

CHAPTER XXXVII

CATALOGUE OF THE FORCES CONTINUED.[22]

Vasishtha said:—Thus the ravaging war was making a rapid end of men, horse, elephants and all; and the bravos coming foremost in the combat, fell in equal numbers on both sides.

2. These (as named before), and many others were reduced to dust and ashes; and the bravery of the brave, served but to send them like poor moths to the fire and flame of destruction.

3. Know now the names of the central districts, not yet mentioned by me, that sent their warriors to the field, in favour of the consort prince of Lílá.

4. These were the inland forces of Sursena (Muttra), the Gudas (Gaudas?), and the Asghanas (?); the Madhymikas and they that dwell under sunlight (the tropics).

5. The Sálukas and Kodmals, and Pippaláyanas; the Mándavyas, Pandyans, Sugrivas and Gurjars.

6. The Páriyátras, Kurashtras, Yamunas and Udumvaras; the Raj-waras, the Ujjainas, the Kálkotas (Calicuts) and the Mathuras (of Muttra).

7. The Páncshálas (Pánjábis), the Northern and Southern Dharmakshetras; the Kurukshetriyas, Páncshálakas and Sáraswatas.

8. The line of war chariots from Avanti, being opposed by the arms of the warriors of the Kunta and Panchanada districts, fell in fighting by the sides of the hills.

9. Those arrayed in silken attire, being dismantled by the enemy, fell upon the ground, and were trodden down by the elephants.

10. The bravadoes of Daspura, being hacked in their breasts and shoulders by the hostile weapons, were pursued by the Banabhuma warriors, and driven to the distant pool.

11. The Sántikas being ripped in their bellies, lay dead and motionless in naked field, and wrapped in their mangled entrails, which were torn and devoured by the voracious Pisáchas at night.

12. There the veteran and vociferous warriors of Bhadrāsiri, who were well skilled in the battle field, drove the Amargas to the ditch, as they drive the tortoises to their pits.

13. The Haihayas were driving the Dandakas, who like fleet stags were flying with the swiftness of winds, and all gushing in blood by the pointed and piercing arrows of the enemy.

14. The Daradas were gored by the tusks of the elephants of their enemies, and were borne away in floods of their blood, like the broken branches of trees.

15. The Chínas (Chinese) were mangled in their bodies by darts and arrows, and cast their tortured bodies in the water, as a burden they could no longer support.

16. The Asúras, pierced in their necks by the flying lances of the Karnatic lancers, fled in all directions like the faggots of fire, or as the flying meteors of heaven.

17. The Sákas and Dásakas were fighting together, by holding down one another by the hair on their heads, as if the whales and elephants were struggling mutually from their respective elements.

18. The flying cowards were entrapped in the snares cast by the Dasárna warriors, as dolphins hiding under the reeds, are dragged out by nets on the blood-red shore.

19. The lifted swords and pikes of the Tongas (Tonguese), destroyed the Gurjara (Guzrati) force by hundreds, and these like razors balded the heads (_i.e._ made widows) of hundreds of Gurjara women. (It is their custom to remain baldheaded in widowhood).

20. The lustre of the lifted weapons of the warriors, illumined the land as by flashes of lightning; and the clouds of arrows were raining like showers of rain in the forest.

21. The flight of the crowbars (bhusundis), which untimely obscured the orb of the sun, affrighted the Abhíra (cowherd) warriors with the dread of an eclipse, and overtook them by surprise, as when they are pursued by a gang of plunderers of their cattle.

22. The handsome gold collared army of the Támras or tawny coloured soldiers, were dragged by the Gauda warriors, as captors snatch their fair captives by the hair.

23. The Tongons were beset by the Kanasas, like cranes by vultures with their blazing weapons, destroying elephants and breaking the discuses in war.

24. The rumbling noise (gudugudurava), raised by the whirling of cudgels by the Gauda gladiators, frightened the Gándháras to a degree, that they were driven like a drove of beasts, or as the dreading Drávidas from the field.

25. The host of the Sáka or Scythian warriors, pouring as a blue torrent from the azure sky, appeared by their sable garb as the mist of night, approaching before their white robed foes of the Persians.

26. The crowded array of lifted arms in the clear and bright atmosphere, appeared as a thick forest under the milk white ocean of frost, that shrouds the mountainous region of Mandara.

27. The flights of arrows which seemed as fragments of clouds in the air from below, appeared as waves of the sea, when viewed by the celestials from above.

28. The air appeared as a forest thickly beset by the trees of spears and lances, with the arrows flying as birds and bees; and innumerable umbrellas, with their gold and silver mountings, appearing as so many moons and stars in the sky.

29. The Kekayas made loud shouts, like the war whoops of drunken soldiers, and the Kankas covered the field like a flight of cranes, and the sky was filled with dust over their heads.

30. The Kiráta army made a purling noise (kulakula) like the effeminate voice of women; causing the lusty Angas to rush upon them with their furious roar.

31. The Kásas (Khasias) covering their bodies with kusa grass (in their grassy garbs), appeared as birds with feathers, and raised clouds of dust by flapping their feathered arms.

32. The giddy warriors of Narmada's coasts, came rushing in the field unarmed with their weapons, and began to fleer and flout and move about in their merry mood.

33. The low statured Sálwas came with the jingling bells of their waist bands, flinging their arrows in the air, and darting showers of their darts around.

34. The soldiers of Sibi were pierced with the spears hurled by the Kuntas. They fell as dead bodies in the field, but their spirits fled to heaven in the form of Vidyádharas.

35. The Pándu-nagaras were laid groveling on the ground in their quick march, by the mighty and light footed army, who had taken possession of the field.

36. The big Páncha-nadas (Punjabis), and the furious warriors of Kási (Benares), crushed the bodies of stalwart warriors with their lances and cudgels, as elephants crush the mighty trees under their feet and tusks.

37. The Burmese and Vatsenis were cut down on the ground by the disks of the Nípas (Nepalese); and the Sahyas were sawn down with saws as 207317 withered trees.

207318
207319 38. The heads of the white Kákas (Caucasians), were lopped off with 207320 sharp axes; and their neighbouring prince of the Bhadras was burnt down
207321 by the fiery arrows (fire arms).

207322
207323 39. The Matangajas (of Elephanta) fell under the hands of Káshthayodhas 207324 (of Katiawar), as old unchained elephants falling in the miry pit; and 207325 others that came to fight, fell as dry fuel into the blazing fire.

207326
207327 40. The Mitragartas falling into the hands of the Trigartas, were 207328 scattered about as straws in the field, and having their heads struck 207329 off in their flight, they entered the infernal regions of death.

207330
207331 41. The weak Vanila force, falling into the hands of the Magadha army, 207332 resembling a sea gently shaken by the breeze, went down in the sands,
207333 as lean and aged elephants.

207334
207335 42. The Chedis lost their lines in fighting with the Tongans, and lay 207336 withered in the field of battle, as flowers when scattered in the 207337 plains, fade away under the shining sun.

207338
207339 43. The Kosalas were unable to withstand the war cry of the deadly 207340 Pauravas, and were discomfited by showers of their clubs, and missile 207341 arrows and darts.

207342
207343 44. Those that were pierced by pikes and spears, became as coral plants
207344 red with blood all over their bodies, and thus besmeared in bloodshed,
207345 they fled to the sheltering hills like red hot suns to the setting
207346 mountains (astáchala).

207347
207348 45. The flight of arrows and weapons borne away by the rapid winds, 207349 moved about in the air as fragments of clouds, with a swarm of black 207350 bees hovering under them.

207351
207352 46. The flying arrows seemed as showering clouds, and their feathers 207353 appeared as the woolly breed; their reedy shafts seeming as trees, were 207354 roving with the roar of elephants.

207355
207356 47. The wild elephants and people of the plains, were all torn to 207357 pieces like bits of torn linen.

207358
207359 48. War chariots with their broken wheels, fell into the pits like the 207360 broken craigs of mountains, and the enemy stood upon their tops as a 207361 thick mist or cloud.

207363 49. The multitude of stalwart warriors meeting in the field, had given 207364 it the appearance of a forest of _tála_ and _tamála_ trees; but their 207365 hands being lopped off by weapons, they made it appear as a mountainous 207366 wood, with its clumps of tapering pine trees.

207367
207368 50. The youthful damsels of Paradise were filled with joy and glee, 207369 to find the groves of their native hill (Meru), full of the brave
207370 champions (fallen in the field).

207371
207372 51. The forest of the army howled in a tremendous roar, until it was 207373 burnt down by the all devouring fire of the enemy.

207374
207375 52. Hacked by the Pisáchas (Assamese), and snatched of their weapons 207376 by the Bhutas (Bhoteas), the Dasárnás (at the confluence of the ten 207377 streams of Vindhya) threw off their staffs, and fled as a herd of 207378 heifers (_nikuchya karnidhavati_—bolted with their broken staves.
207379 Pánini).

207380
207381 53. The Kásias were eager to despoil the tinsels from the dead bodies 207382 of the chiefs by their valour, as the summer heat robs the beauty of 207383 lotuses in a drying pool.

207384
207385 54. The Tushákas were beset by the Mesalas, with their darts, spears and mallets; and the sly Katakas were defeated and driven away by the Narakas in battle.

55. The Kauntas were surrounded by Prastha warriors, and were defeated like good people by the treachery of the wily.

56. The elephant drivers, that struck off the heads of their hosts in a trice, were pursued by the harpooners, and fled with their severed heads, as they do with the lotus-flowers plucked by their hands.

57. The Sáraswatas fought on both sides with one another until it was evening, and yet no party was the loser or gainer, as in a learned discussion between pandits and among lawyers.

58. The puny and short statured Deccanese, being driven back by the Rákshas of Lanka, redoubled their attack on them, as the smothering fire is rekindled by fuel.

59. What more shall I relate Ráma about this war, which baffles the attempt of the serpent Vásuki even, to give a full description of it with his hundred tongues and mouths.

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

CESSATION OF THE WAR.

Vasishtha continued:—Now as the war was waging fiercely, with mingled shouts on both sides, the sun shrouded his burnished armour under the mist of darkness, and was about to set.

2. The waters of the limpid streams glided with the showers of stones flung by the forces, and falling on the fading clusters of lotuses growing in them.

3. Flashes of fire glittered in the sky, by the clashing of the shafts and darts below; and waves of arrows were seen, now approaching nigh and now receding at a distance.

4. Severed heads like loose lotuses, floated and whirled in the whirlpools of blood below, and the sea of heaven was filled with flying weapons, moving as marine animals above.

5. The rustling of the breeze and the whistling of the overshadowing clouds of weapons, frightened the aerial Siddhas and sylvan apes, with the fear of an approaching rain.

6. The day declined after it had run its course of the eight watches (Yámárdhas), and assumed the graceful countenance of a hero, returning in glory, after he has fought his battle.

7. The army like the day, declined in splendour, being battered in its cavalry, and shattered in its force of elephants.

8. Then the commanders of the armies, in concert with the ministers of war, sent envoys to the hostile parties for a truce to the fighting.

9. Both parties agreed to the armistice, seeing how much they were harassed in the engagement; and the soldiers with one voice, gave their assent to it.

10. They hoisted their soaring banners of truce on the pinnacles of the highest chariots (rathas); and a crier on each side, mounted over one, to give proclamation to the armies below.

11. They furled the white flags on all sides, which like so many moons in the gloom of night, proclaimed peace on earth by cessation from contention.

12. Then the drums sent their loud peals around, which were resounded by roarings of the clouds (Pushkarāvartas) above and all about.

13. The flights of arrows and weapons, that had been raging as fire in the atmosphere, now began to fall in torrents, like the currents of the lake Mansaravara on the ground below.

14. The hands and arms of the warriors were now at rest like their feet; as the shaking of trees and the surges of the sea are at an end after the earthquake is over.

15. The two armies now went their own ways from the field of battle, as the arms of the sea run into the land in different directions.

16. The armies being at rest, there was an end of all agitation in the field; as the waves of the ocean are lulled to rest, on its calm after a storm (literally, after its churning by the Mandara mountain).

17. It became in an instant as dreadful as the dismal womb of death (Pútaná); and as deep and dark as the hollow pit of the sea, after its waters were sucked up by Agastya (the sun).

18. It was full of the dead bodies of men and beasts, and flowed in floods of purpling blood; it was resonant with the sounds of insects, like a heath with the humming of beetles.

19. The gory bodies were gushing with blood, and gurgling as the waves of the sea; and the cries of the wounded who wished to live, pierced the ears, and throbbed the heart strings of the living.

20. The dead and wounded weltering side by side in streams of blood, made the living think the dead as still alive like themselves.

21. Big elephants lying dead in piles in the field appeared as fragments of clouds, and the heaps of broken chariots seemed as a forest dispersed by the storm.

22. Streams of blood were running with the dead bodies of horses and elephants, and heaps of arrows and spears and mattocks and mallets, flowing together with broken swords and missiles.

23. Horses were lying girt in their halters and harnesses, and the soldiers wrapt in their mails and armours; and flags and flappers and turbans and helmets lay scattered in the field.

24. The winds were rustling in the orifice of the quivers, like the hissing of arrowy snakes, or as the whistling of the breeze in the holes of bamboo trees; and the Pisáchas were rolling on beds of dead bodies, as upon their beddings of straws.

25. The gold chains of the helmets and the head ornaments of the fallen soldiers, glittered with the various colours of the rainbow, and greedy dogs and jackals were tearing the entrails of the dead like long ropes or strings.

26. The wounded were gnashing their teeth in the field of blood, like the croaking of frogs in the miry pool of blood.

27. Those clad in party coloured coats with a hundred spots on them, had now their arms and thighs gushing in a hundred streams of blood.

28. The friends of the dead and wounded, were wailing bitterly over their bodies; lying amidst the heaps of arrows and weapons, the broken cars and the scattered trappings of horses and elephants, which had covered the land.

29. Headless trunks of the goblins were dancing about with their uplifted arms touching the sky; and the stink of the carrion, fat and blood, filled the nostrils with nausea.

30. Elephants and horses of noble breed, lay dead and others gasping with their mouths gaping upwards; and the dashing of the waving streams of blood, beat as loud as drums against their rock-like bodies.

31. The blood gushing out of the pores of the wounded horses and elephants, ran like that of a wounded whale into a hundred streams. And the blood spouting from the mouths of the dying soldiers flowed into a hundred channels.

32. Those who were pierced with arrows in their eyes and mouths, were uttering an inaudible voice in their last gasp of death; and those pierced in their bellies, had their bowels gushing out with a horrible stench; while the ground was reddened with thickened blood issuing out of the wounds.

33. Half dead elephants grasped the headless trunks with their uplifted trunks (proboscis), while the loose horses and elephants, that had lost their riders, were trampling over the dead bodies at random.

34. The weeping, crying and tottering wives of the fallen soldiers, fell upon their dead bodies weltering in blood, and embracing them fast by their necks, made an end of themselves with the same weapons.

35. Bodies of soldiers were sent with their guides on the way, to fetch the dead bodies from the field; and the hands of their lively companions, were busily employed in dragging the dead.

36. The field had become a wide river running with waves of blood, and breaking into a hundred whirling streams, carrying the severed heads, as lotuses swimming in them, and the torn braids of hair floating as bushes on them.

37. Men were busy to extract the weapons from the bodies of the wounded, who lamented loudly on account of their dying in a foreign land, and losing their arms and armours and horses and elephants in the field.

38. The dying souls remembered their sons and parents, their dear ones and their adored deities, and called out by their names; and began to sigh and sob with heart-rending heigh-hos and alacks.

39. The brave that died cursed their fates, and those falling in their fighting with elephants, blamed the unkind gods they had adored in vain.

40. The cowards fearing to be killed betook themselves to base flight; but the dauntless brave stepped forward amidst the whirlpools of blood.

41. Some suffering under the agony of arrows piercing their mortal parts, thought upon the sins of their past lives, that had brought this pain upon them; while the blood sucking Vetálas, advanced with their horrid mouths for drinking the blood of the headless trunks (Kabandhas).

42. The floating flags and umbrellas and flappers, seemed as white lotuses in the lake of blood below, while the evening stretched her train of stars like red lotuses in the etherial sea above.

43. The battle field presented the appearance of an eighth sea of blood; the rathas or warcars forming its rocks, and their wheels its whirlpools; the flags being its foam and froth, and the white flappers as its bubbles. (There are seven seas only on record).

44. The field of blood with the scattered cars, appeared as a track of land plunged in mud and mire, and covered over with woods broken down and blown away by a hurricane.

207593 45. It was as desolate as a country burnt down by a conflagration, and 207594 as the dry bed of the sea sucked up by the sage Agastya (the sun). It 207595 was as a district devastated by a sweeping flood.
207596

207597 46. It was filled with heaps of weapons, as high as the bodies of big 207598 elephants lying dead about the ground.
207599

207600 47. The lances which were carried down by the streams of blood, were as 207601 big as the palm trees growing on the summits of mountains. (Compare the 207602 description in Ossian's poems).
207603

207604 48. The weapons sticking in the bodies of the elephants, seemed as the 207605 shining flowers growing on verdant trees: and the entrails torn and 207606 borne up by vultures, spread a fretted network in the sky.
207607

207608 49. The lances fixed beside the streams of blood, were as a woody
207609 forest on the bank of a river; and the flags floating on the surface, 207610 appeared as a bush of lotuses in the liquid-blood.
207611

207612 50. Dead bodies of men were drawn up by their friends, from the bloody 207613 pool in which they were drowned, and the embedded bodies of big 207614 elephants were marked by men by the jutting weapons sticking in them.
207615

207616 51. The trunks of trees which had their branches lopped off by the 207617 weapons, appeared as the headless bodies of slain soldiers, and the 207618 floating carcasses of elephants seemed as so many boats swimming in the 207619 sea of blood.
207620

207621 52. The white garments that were swept down by the current, seemed as 207622 the froth of the pool of blood, and were picked up by the servants sent 207623 to search them out.
207624

207625 53. The demoniac bodies of headless soldiers, were rising and falling 207626 in the field, and hurling large wheels and disks upon the flying army
207627 on all sides.
207628

207629 54. The dying warriors were frothing forth floods of blood from their 207630 throats, and stones stained with blood were inviting the greedy
207631 vultures to devour them.
207632

207633 55. Then there were groups of Sutála, Vetála and Uttála demons dancing
207634 their war dance about the field, and whirling the rafts of the broken 207635 cars upon the flying soldiers on all sides.
207636

207637 56. The stir and last gasp of those that were yet alive, were fearful 207638 to behold, and the faces of the dying and the dead that were covered in 207639 dust and blood, were pitiful to the beholder.
207640

207641 57. The devouring dogs and ravenous ravens beheld the last gasp of 207642 the dying with pity; while the feeders on carrions were howling and 207643 fighting on their common carcass, till many of them became dead bodies
207644 by their mutual fighting.
207645

207646 58. Now I have described the sea of blood, which flowed fast with 207647 the gore of unnumbered hosts of horses, elephants and camels, and of 207648 warriors and their leaders, and multitudes of cars, and war chariots; 207649 but it became a pleasure garden to the god of death, delighting in his 207650 bed of bloodshed, and grove of the weapons beset all around.
207651

207655 CHAPTER XXXIX.

207657 DESCRIPTION OF THE BATTLE-FIELD INFESTED BY NOCTURNAL FIENDS.

207660 Now the blood-red sun set down in the west, like a hero red with blood;
207661 and hid his lustre, which was dimmed by the brightness of the weapons

207662 of war in the western main.

207663
207664 2. The sky which had reflected the blood-red flush of the field of 207665 blood, was now dimmed by the setting of the glorious sun, and darkened 207666 by the veil of evening.

207668 3. Thick darkness overspread the face of heaven and earth like the 207669 waters of the great deluge, and there appeared a body of ghosts
207670 (Vetálas), dancing in a ring and clapping their hands.

207671
207672 4. The face of the day like that of an elephant, being besmeared with 207673 the blackness of night fall, was again painted by the light of evening
207674 with the pearly spots of stars on the cheeks.

207675
207676 5. The busy buzz of Creation being silent in the dead darkness of 207677 night, like the humming of bees over the surface of the waters, the 207678 hearts of men were closed in sleep as in death, like the petals of the 207679 lotus at night.

207680
207681 6. The birds lay with their folded wings and fallen crests in their 207682 nests, as the dead bodies were lying in the field, covered with their 207683 wounds and weapons.

207684
207685 7. Then the fair moonbeams shone above, and the white lotuses were 207686 blown below; the hearts of men were gladdened, and the victors felt 207687 joyous in themselves.

207688
207689 8. The ruddy evening assumed the shape of the blood-red sea of battle, 207690 and the fluttering bees now hid themselves like the faces of the fallen 207691 soldiers.

207692
207693 9. There was an ethereal lake above spangled with stars like the white
207694 lotuses on high; and here was the earthly lake below, beset by lotuses
207695 resembling the stars of heaven.

207696
207697 10. The bodies that were thought to be lost in darkness, were now
207698 recovered in light, as the gems hid under the water, are found
207699 scattered about in moonlight.

207700
207701 11. The battle field was filled by the Vetála demons, howling with 207702 their hideous cry; while bodies of vultures, crows and owls, were 207703 tearing the carcasses and sporting with the skeletons.

207704
207705 12. Then blazed the funeral piles as brightly as the starry frame on 207706 high, and the fire consumed the dead bodies together with their bones
207707 and raiments.

207709 13. The fire burnt the bodies with their bones to ashes, after which 207710 it extinguished itself as if sated with plenty. The female fiends now 207711 began to sport in the water.

207712
207713 14. There arose a mingled cry of dogs and crows, of Yakshas and 207714 Vetálas, with the clapping of their hands; and bodies of ghosts were 207715 moving about as woods and forests.

207716
207717 15. The Dákinis (Dáyinis) were eager to steal away the flesh and fat 207718 from the piles, and the Pisáchas delighted in sucking the blood and the 207719 flesh and bones of the dead.

207720
207721 16. The demons were now looking and now lurking about the funeral 207722 piles, and the Rákshasas that rushed in, bore away the carcasses on 207723 their shoulders.

207725 17. There came also bodies of ferocious Kumbhándas, and big Dámaras, 207726 uttering their barbarous cries of chumchum, and hovering over the 207727 fumes of fat and flesh in the shapes of clouds.

207728
207729 18. Bodies of Vetálas stood in the streams of blood like earthly 207730 beings, and snatched the skeletons with hideous cries.

19. The Vetála younglings slept in the bellies and chests of the elephants, and the Rákshasas were drinking their fill in the bloody field.
20. The giddy Vetálas fought with one another with the lighted faggots of the piles, and the winds were wafting the stench of the putrid carcasses on all sides.
21. The female fiends (Rúpikás), filled the baskets of their bellies with carrion, with a rat-a-tat (ratarata) noise; and the Yaksha cannibals were snatching the half-burnt carcasses from the funeral piles, as their roasted meat and dainty food (S. kali A. Kul).
22. Aerial imps (khagas) attacked the dead bodies of the big Bangas and black Kalingas, and flouted about with their open mouths, emitting the blaze of falling meteors.
23. The Vetála goblins fell down in the dark and discoloured blood-pits, lying hid in the midst of the heaps of dead bodies; while the Pisácha ogres and the leaders of Yogini sprites, laughed at them for their false step (vetála).
24. The pulling of the entrails (antras-ánts), vibrated as by striking the strings of wired instruments (tantras-or tánts); and the ghosts of men that had become fiends from their fiendish desires, fell a-fighting with one another.
25. Valiant soldiers were affrighted at the sight of the spectres (Rúpikás); and the obsequies were disturbed by the Vetála and Rákshasa goblins.
26. The hobgoblins of the night (nisácharas), got frightened at the fall of the carcasses from the shoulders of the elves (Rúpikás), who were carrying them aloft in the air; where they were waylaid by a throng of ghostly demons (bhúta-sankata).
27. Many dying bodies, that were lifted aloft with labour by the bogies (Dánas), were let to fall down dead on the ground, being found unfit for their food.
28. Pieces of blood-red flesh, fallen from the fiery jaws of jackals, resembled clusters of _asoka_ flowers, strewn all around the funeral ground.
29. Vetála urchins were busy in putting on the scattered heads over the headless bodies of kabandhas (acephali); and bodies of Yaksha, Raksha and Pisácha ogres, were flashing as firebrands in the sky.
30. At last a thick cloud of darkness, covered the face or the sky, and the view of the hills and valleys, gardens and groves, was hid under an impenetrable gloom. The infernal spirits got loose from their dismal abodes, and ranged and ravaged at large over the field, as a hurricane under the vault of heaven.

CHAPTER XL.

REFLECTIONS ON HUMAN LIFE AND MIND.

Vasishtha related:—The nocturnal fiends were thus infesting the gloomy field, and the myrmidons of death (Yama), roaming about it as marauders in the day time.

2. The naked and fleeting ghosts, were revelling on their provision of carrion in their nightly abode, and under the canopy of thick darkness, which was likely to be laid hold upon under the clutches of one's hand (hasta-gráhya).

3. It was in the still hour of the gloomy night, when the host of heaven seemed to be fast bound in sleep, that a sadness stole in upon the mind of Lílá's magnanimous husband (the belligerent prince Vidúratha by name).

4. He thought about what was to be done on the next morning, in council with his Counsellors; and then went to his bed, which was as white as moonlight, and as cold as frost. (A cold bed in the east _vs._ a warm one in the west).

5. His lotus-eyes were closed in sleep for a while in his royal camp, which was as white as the moonbeams, and covered by the cold dews of night.

6. Then the two ladies, issued forth from their vacuous abode, and entered the tent through a crevice, as the air penetrates into the heart and amidst an unblown bud of flower.

7. Ráma asked:—How is it possible sir, that the gross bodies of the goddesses, with their limited dimensions, could enter the tent through one of its holes, as small as the pore of a piece of cloth?

8. Vasishtha answered saying that:—Whoso mistakes himself to be composed of a material body, it is no way possible for him to enter a small hole with that gross body of his.

9. But he who thinks himself to be pent up in his corporeal body as in a cage, and obstructed by it in his flight, and does not believe himself to fill his frame, or to be measured by its length; but has the true notion of his inward subtle spirit, it is no way impossible for him to have his passage any where he pleases to go.

10. He who perceives his original spiritual state, as forming the better half of his body, may pass as a spirit through a chink; but whoso relies in his subsequent half of the material body, cannot go beyond it in the form of his intellect.

11. As the air never rises upward, nor the flame of fire ever goes downward; so it is the nature of the spirit to rise upward, as that of the body to go down; but the intellect is made to turn in the way in which it is trained.

12. As the man sitting in the shade, has no notion of the feeling of heat or warmth; so one man has no idea of the knowledge or thoughts of another person.

13. As is one's knowledge so is his thought, and such is the mode of his life; it is only by means of ardent practice (of yoga and learning), that the mind is turned to the right course.

14. As one's belief of a snake in a rope, is removed by the conviction of his error; so are the bent of the mind and course of conduct in life, changed from wrong to right by the knowledge of truth.

15. It is one's knowledge that gives rise to his thoughts, and the thoughts that direct his pursuits in life: this is a truth known even to the young and to every man of sense.

16. Now then the soul that resembles a being seen in a dream or formed in fancy, and which is of the nature of air and vacuum, is never liable to be obstructed any where in its course: (for who can constrain the flight of his imagination?).

17. There is an intellectual body, which all living beings possess in every place. It is known both by consciousness, as well as the feelings of our hearts.

18. It is by the divine will, that the intellect rises and sets by turns. At first it was produced in its natural, simple and intellectual form, and then being invested with a material body, it makes together an unity of the person out of the duality (of its material and immaterial essences).

19. Now you must know the triple vacuity, composed of the three airy substances—the spirit, mind and space, to be one and the same thing (all the three being equally all pervasive); but not so their receptacle (of the material body), which has no pervasion.

20. Know this intellectual body of beings, to be like the air, present with every thing and every where (over which it extends and which it grasps in itself); just as your desire of knowing extends over all things in all places, and presents them all to your knowledge.

21. It abides in the smallest particles, and reaches to the spheres of heavens (which it grasps within itself): it reposes in the cells of flowers, and delights in the leaves of trees. (_i.e._ It stretches over all these things in its knowledge of them).

22. It delights in hills and dales, and dances over the waves of the oceans; it rides over the clouds, and falls down in the showers of rain and hailstones of heaven.

23. It moves at pleasure in the vast firmament, and penetrates through the solid mountains. Its body bears no break in it, and is as minute as an atom.

24. Yet it becomes as big as a mountain lifting its head to heaven, and as large as the earth, which is the fixed and firm support of all things. It views the inside and outside of every thing, and bears the forests like hairs on its body.

25. It extends in the form of the sky, and contains millions of worlds in itself; it identifies itself with the ocean, and transforms its whirlpools to spots upon its person.

26. It is of the nature of an uninterrupted understanding, ever calm and serene in its aspect; it is possessed of its intellectual form, from before the creation of the visible world, and being all comprehensive as vacuity itself, it is conversant with the natures of all beings.

27. It is an unreality as the appearance of water in the mirage, but manifests itself as a reality to the understanding by its intelligence. Without this (intellection), the intellectual man is a nil as the son of a barren woman, and a blank as the figure of a body seen in a dream.

28. Ráma asked:—How is that mind to which you attribute so many powers, and what is that again which you say to be nothing? Why is it no reality, and as something distinct from all what we see?

29. Vasishtha replied:—All individual minds are indued with these faculties, except all such individualities, whose minds are engrossed with the error (of the reality) of the outer world.

30. All the worlds are either of a longer or shorter duration, and they appear and disappear at times; some of these vanish in a moment, and others endure to the end of a _Kalpa_. But it is not so with the mind, whose progress I will now relate to you.

31. There is an insensibility which overtakes every man before his death; this is the darkness of his dissolution (mahá-pralaya-yáminí).

32. After the shocks of delirium and death are over, the spiritual part of every man, is regenerated anew in a different form, as if it was roused from a state of trance, reverie or swoon; (the three states of insensibility—avidyá-trayam).

33. And as the spirit of God, assumes his triune form with the persons of Brahmá and Viráj, after the dissolution of the world for its recreation; so every person receives the triplicate form of his spiritual, intellectual and corporeal beings, after the termination of his life by death.

34. Ráma said:—As we believe ourselves to be reproduced after death by reason of our reminiscence; so must we understand the recreation of all bodies in the world by the same cause. Hence there is nothing uncaused in it (as it was said with regard to the unproduced Brahmá and others).

35. Vasishtha replied:—The gods Hari, Hara and others, having obtained their disembodied liberation or videha-mukti, (i.e. the final extinction of their bodies, their minds and spirit as in nirvána), at the universal dissolution, could not retain their reminiscence to cause their regeneration.

36. But human beings having both their spiritual and intellectual bodies entire at their death, do not lose their remembrance of the past, nor can they have their final liberation like Brahmá, unless they obtain their disembodied state, which is possible to all in this life or hereafter, by the edification of their souls, through yoga meditation alone.

37. The birth and death of all other beings like yourself, are caused by their reminiscence, and for want of their disembodied liberation or eternal salvation.

38. The living soul retains its consciousness within itself, after its pangs of death are over; but remains in its state of insensibility by virtue of its own nature (called pradhána).

39. The universal vacuum is called nature (prakriti). It is the reflexion of the invisible divine mind (chit prativimbam); and is the parent of all that is dull or moving (Jadá-Jada), which are so produced by cause of their reminiscence or its absence (sansmriti and asmriti); the former causing the regeneration of living beings, and the latter its cessation as in inert matter.

40. As the living principle or animal life begins to have its understanding (bodha), it is called mahat or an intelligent being, which is possessed of its consciousness (ahankára). It has then the organs of perception and conception, added to it from their elements (tanmátras) residing in the vacuous ether.

41. This minutely intelligent substance, is next joined with the five internal senses, which form its body, and which is otherwise called its spiritual body (átivahika or lingadeha).

42. This spiritual being by its long association with the external senses, comes to believe itself as a sensible being; and then by imagining to have the sensible form, it finds itself invested with a material body (ádhibhautika-deha) as beautiful as that of a lotus.

43. Then seated in the embryo, it reposes in a certain position for sometime, and inflated itself like the air, until it is fully expanded.

44. It then thinks itself to be fully developed in the womb, as a man dreams of a fairy form in his sleep, and believes this illusion as a reality.

45. He then views the outer world, where he is born to die, just as one visits a land where he is destined to meet his death; and there remains to relish its enjoyments, as prepared for him.

46. But the spiritual man soon perceives every thing as pure vacuum, and that his own body and this world are but illusions and vain vacuities.

47. He perceives the gods, and human habitations, the hills and the heavens resplendent with the sun and stars, to be no more than abodes of disease and debility, decay and ultimate death and destruction.

48. He sees nothing but a sad change in the natures of things, and all that is movable or immovable, great or small, together with the seas, hills and rivers and peoples of this earth and the days and nights, are all subject to decay sooner or later.

49. The knowledge that I am born here of this father, and that this is my mother, these my treasures, and such are my hopes and expectations, is as false as empty air.

50. That these are my merits and these my demerits, and these the desires that I had at heart; that I was a boy and am now young; are the airy thoughts of the hollow mind.

51. This world resembles a forest, where every being is like a detached arbor; the sable clouds are its leaves, and the stars its full blown flowers.

52. The walking men are as its restless deer, and the aerial gods and demons its birds of the air; the broad day light is the flying dust of its flowers, and the dark night the deep covert of its grove.

53. The seas are like its rills and fountains, and the eight boundary mountains as its artificial hills; the mind is the great tank in it, containing the weeds and shrubs of human thoughts in abundance.

54. Wherever a man dies, he is instantly changed to this state, and views the same things every where; and every one thus rises and falls incessantly, like the leaves of trees in this forest of the world.

55. Millions of Brahmás, Rudras, Indras, Maruts, Vishnus and Suns, together with unnumbered mountains and seas, continents and islands, have appeared and disappeared in the eternal course of the world.

56. Thus no one can count the numbers of beings that have passed away, are passing and shall have to pass hereafter, nor such as are in existence and have to become extinct in the unfathomable eternity of Brahma.

57. Hence it is impossible to comprehend the stupendous fabric of the universe any how except in the mind, which is as spacious as the infinite space itself, and as variable as the course of events in the world.

58. The mind is the vacuous sphere of the intellect, and the infinite sphere of the intellect, is the seat of the Supreme.

59. Now know the whirlpool and waves of the sea to be of the same element, as the sea in which they rise and fall, though they are not of the same durable nature as the sea water, by reason of their evanescence. So the phenomena are the same with the Noumena, though none of these is a reality.

60. The ethereal sphere of heaven, is but a reflexion of the intellectual sphere of the Divine mind, and the bright orbs of the firmament, are as gems in the bosom of Brahma. Its concavity is the cave of the mind of the Eternal One.

61. The world according to the sense in which I take it, as the seat of God, is highly interesting, but not so in your sense of its being a sober reality. So the meaning of the words "I and thou," refers according to me to the intellectual spirit, and according to you to the living soul and body.

208076 62. Hence Lílá and Sarasvatí, being in their vacuous intellectual 208077 bodies, were led by the pure desire of their souls, to every place
208078 without any obstruction or interruption.
208079

208080 63. The intellectual spirit has the power, to present itself wherever 208081 it likes, on earth or in the sky, and before objects known or unknown
208082 and wished to be known by it. It was by this power that they could 208083 enter into the tent of the prince.
208084

208085 64. The intellect has its way to all places and things, over which 208086 it exercises its powers of observation, reflection and reasoning to 208087 their full extent. This is known as the spiritual and unconfined body
208088 (Átiváhika), whose course cannot be obstructed by any restriction 208089 whatever.
208090

208091 CHAPTER XLI.

208092 DISCRIMINATION OF ERROR.

208093
208094
208095
208096
208097
208098
208099 Vasishtha said:—Upon the entrance of the ladies in the tent, it
208100 appeared as a bed of lotuses; and its white vault, seemed as graceful 208101 as the vault of heaven with two moons rising at once under it.
208102

208103 2. A pure and cooling fragrance spread about it, as if wafted by the 208104 breeze from the Mandara flowers; and lulled the prince to sleep, with 208105 every body lying in their camps.
208106

208107 3. It made the place as pleasant as the garden of Eden (Nandana), and 208108 healed all the pains and cares of the people there. It seemed as a 208109 vernal garden, filled with the fragrance of the fresh blown lotuses in 208110 the morning.
208111

208112 4. The cooling and moon-bright radiance of the ladies, roused the 208113 prince from his sleep, as if he was sprinkled over with the juice of 208114 ambrosia.
208115

208116 5. He beheld upon his rising the forms of two fairies (apsarás), seated 208117 on two stools, and appearing as two moons risen on two pinnacles of the 208118 mount Meru.
208119

208120 6. The prince beheld them with wonder, and after being composed in his 208121 mind, he rose up from his bed, as the god Vishnu rises from his bed of 208122 the serpent.
208123

208124 7. Then advancing respectfully to them, with long strings of flowers in 208125 his hands, he made offerings of them to the ladies, with handfuls of 208126 flowers flung at their feet.
208127

208128 8. Leaving his pillowed sofa in the midst of the hall, he sat with his 208129 folded legs on the ground; and lowly bending his head, he addressed
208130 them saying:—
208131

208132 9. Be victorious, O moon-bright goddesses! that drive away all the 208133 miseries and evils and pains and pangs of life, by your radiance, and 208134 dispel all my inward and outward darkness by your sunlike beams.
208135

208136 10. Saying so he poured handfuls of flowers on their feet, as the trees
208137 on the bank of a lake, drop down their flowers on the lotuses growing 208138 in it.
208139

208140 11. Then the goddess desiring to unfold the pedigree of the prince, 208141 inspired his minister, who was lying by, to relate it to Lílá.
208142

208143 12. He upon waking, saw the nymphs manifest before him, and advancing 208144 lowly before them, threw handfuls of flowers upon their feet.

208145
208146 13. The goddess said:—Let us know, O prince! who you are and when and 208147 of whom you are born herein. Hearing these words of the goddess, the 208148 minister spake saying:—
208149

208150 14. It is by your favour, O gracious goddesses! that I am empowered to 208151 give a relation of my prince's genealogy to your benign graces.
208152

208153 15. There was a sovereign, born of the imperial line of Ixaku, by name
208154 of Mukunda-ratha, who had subjugated the earth under his arms.
208155

208156 16. He had a moon-faced son by name of Bhadraratha; whose son
208157 Viswaratha was father to the renowned prince Brihadratha.
208158

208159 17. His son Sindhuratha was the father of Sailaratha, and his son 208160 Kámaratha was father of Maháratha.
208161

208162 18. His son Vishnuratha was father of Nabhoratha, who gave birth to 208163 this my lord of handsome appearance.
208164

208165 19. He is renowned as Vidúratha, and is born with the great virtues 208166 of his sire, as the moon was produced of the milky ocean, to shed his 208167 ambrosial beams over his people.
208168

208169 20. He was begotten by his mother Sumitrá, as the god Guha of Gauri; 208170 and was installed in the realm at the tenth year of his age, owing to 208171 his father's betaking himself to asceticism.
208172

208173 21. He has been ruling the realm since that time with justice; and your 208174 appearance here to night, betokens the blossoming of his good fortune.
208175

208176 22. O goddesses! whose presence is hard to be had, even by the merit of 208177 long devotion, and a hundred austerities, you see here the lord of the 208178 earth-famed Vidúratha, present before you.
208179

208180 23. He is highly blessed to-day by your favour. After saying these 208181 words, the minister remained silent with the lord of the earth.
208182

208183 24. They were sitting on the ground with their folded legs (padmāsana), 208184 and clasped hands (kritánjali), and downcast looks; when the goddess
208185 of wisdom told the prince, to remember his former births, by her 208186 inspiration.
208187

208188 25. So saying, she touched his head with her hand, and immediately the 208189 dark veil of illusion and oblivion was dispersed from over the lotus of 208190 his mind.
208191

208192 26. It opened as a blossom by the touch of the genius of intelligence, 208193 and became as bright as the clear firmament, with the rays of his 208194 former reminiscence.
208195

208196 27. He remembered by his intelligence his former kingdom, of which he 208197 had been the sole lord, and recollected all his past sports with Lílá.
208198

208199 28. He was led away by the thoughts of the events of his past lives, as 208200 one is carried away by the current of waves, and reflected in himself, 208201 this world to be a magic sea of illusion.
208202

208203 29. He said: I have come to know this by the favour of the goddesses, 208204 but how is it that so many events have occurred to me in course of one 208205 day after my death.
208206

208207 30. Here I have passed full seventy years of my lifetime, and recollect 208208 to have done many works, and remember also to have seen my grand-sire.
208209

208210 31. I recollect the bygone days of my boyhood and youth, and I remember 208211 well all the friends and relatives and all the apparels and suite, that 208212 I had before.
208213

32. The goddess replied:—Know O king! that after the fit of insensibility attending on your death was over, your soul continued to remain in the vacuum of the same place, of which you are still a resident.

33. This royal pavilion, where you think yourself to abide, is situated in the vacuous space, within the house of the Bráhmaṇ in that hilly district.

34. It is inside that house that you see the appearances of your other abodes present before you: and it was in that Bráhmaṇa's house, that you devoted your life to my worship.

35. It is the shrine within the very house and on the same spot, that contains the whole world which you are seeing all about you.

36. This abode of yours is situated in the same place, and within the clear firmament of your mind.

37. It is a false notion of your mind, which you have gained by your habitual mode of thinking, that you are born in your present state, of the race of Ixáku.

38. It is mere imagination, which has made you to suppose yourself to be named so and so, and that such and such persons were your progenitors, and that you had been a boy of ten years.

39. That your father became an ascetic in the woods, and left you in the government of the realm. And that you have subjugated many countries under your dominion, and are now reigning as the lord paramount over them.

40. And that you are ruling on earth with these ministers and officers of yours, and are observant of the sacrificial rites, and a just ruler of your subjects.

41. You think that you have passed seventy years of your life, and that you are now beset by very formidable enemies.

42. And that having waged a furious battle, you have returned to this abode of yours, where you are now seated and intend to adore the goddesses, that have become your guests herein.

43. You are thinking that these goddesses will bless you with your desired object, because one of them has given you the power of recollecting the events of your former births.

44. That these goddesses have opened your understanding like the blossom of a lotus, and that you have the prospect of getting your riddance from all doubts.

45. That you are now at peace and rest, and enjoy the solace of your solity; and that your long continued error (of this world), is now removed for ever.

46. You remember the many acts and enjoyments of your past life, in the body of prince Padma, before you were snatched away by the hand of death.

47. You now perceive in your mind, that your present life is but a shadow of the former, as it is the same wave, that carries one onward, by its rise and fall.

48. The incessant current of the mind flows as the stream of a river, and leads a man, like a weed, from one whirlpool into another.

49. The course of life now runs singly as in dreaming, and now conjointly with the body as in the waking state, both of which leave their traces in the mind, at the hour of death.

208283
208284 50. The sun of the intellect being hid under the mist of ignorance, 208285 there arises this network of the erroneous world, which makes a moment
208286 appear as a period of hundred years.
208287

208288 51. Our lives and deaths are mere phantoms of imagination, as we 208289 imagine houses and towers in aerial castles and icebergs.
208290

208291 52. The world is an illusion, like the delusion of moving banks and 208292 trees to a passenger in a vessel on water, or a rapid vehicle on land;
208293 or as the trembling of a mountain or quaking of the earth, to one 208294 affected by a convulsive disease.
208295

208296 53. As one sees extraordinary things in his dream, such as the 208297 decapitation of his own head; so he views the illusions of the world, 208298 which can hardly be true.
208299

208300 54. In reality you were neither born nor dead at any time or place;
208301 but ever remain as pure intelligence in your own tranquility of soul.
208302

208303 55. You seem to see all things about you, but you see nothing real in 208304 them; it is your all seeing soul, that sees every thing in itself.
208305

208306 56. The soul shines as a brilliant gem by its own light, and nothing 208307 that appears beside it, as this earth or yourself or any thing else, is 208308 a reality.
208309

208310 57. These hills and cities, these people and things, and ourselves
208311 also, are all unreal and mere phantoms, appearing in the hollow vault
208312 of the Bráhmāna of the hilly district.
208313

208314 58. The kingdom of Lílá's husband, was but a picture of this earth, and 208315 his palace with all its grandeur, is contained in the sphere of the 208316 same hollow shrine.
208317

208318 59. The known world is contained in the vacuous sphere of that shrine, 208319 and it is in one corner of this mundane habitation, that all of us
208320 here, are situated.
208321

208322 60. The sphere of this vaulted shrine, is as clear as vacuity itself, 208323 which has no earth nor habitation in it.
208324

208325 61. It is without any forest, hill, sea or river, and yet all beings 208326 are found to rove about in this empty and homeless abode (_i.e._ in the 208327 Divine Mind).
208328

208329 62. Here there are no kings, nor their retinue, nor any thing that they 208330 have on earth. Vidúratha asked:—If it is so, then tell me goddess! how 208331 I happened to have these dependants here?
208332

208333 63. A man is rich in his own mind and spirit, and is it not so ordained 208334 by the Divine mind and spirit also? If not, then the world must appear 208335 as a mere dream, and all these men and things are but creatures of our 208336 dreams.
208337

208338 64. Tell me goddess, what things are spiritually true and false, and 208339 how are we to distinguish the one from the other.
208340

208341 65. Sarasvatí answered:—Know prince that, those who have known
208342 the only knowable one, and are assimilated to the nature of pure
208343 understanding, view nothing as real in the world, except the vacuous
208344 intellect within themselves.
208345

208346 66. The misconception of the serpent in a rope being removed, the 208347 fallacy of the rope is removed also; so the unreality of the world
208348 being known, the error of its existence, also ceases to exist.
208349

208350 67. Knowing the falsity of water in the mirage, no one thirsts after 208351 it any more, so knowing the falsehood of dreams, no one thinks himself dead as he had dreamt. The fear of dreaming death may overtake the dying, but it can never assail the living in his dream.

68. He whose soul is enlightened with the clear light of the autumnal moon of his pure intellect, is never misled to believe his own existence or that of others, by the false application of the terms _I_, _thou_, _this_ &c.

69. As the sage was sermonizing in this manner, the day departed to its evening service with the setting sun. The assembly broke with mutual greetings to perform their ablutions, and it met again with the rising sun, after dispersion of the gloom of night.

CHAPTER XLII.

PHILOSOPHY OF DREAMING. SWAPNAM OR SOMNUM.

The man who is devoid of understanding, ignorant and unacquainted with the All-pervading principle, thinks the unreal world as real, and as compact as adamant.

2. As a child is not freed from his fear of ghosts until his death; so the ignorant man never gets rid of his fallacy of the reality of the unreal world, as long as he lives.

3. As the solar heat causes the error of water in the mirage to the deer and unwary people, so the unreal world appears as real to the ignorant part of mankind.

4. As the false dream of one's death, appears to be true in the dreaming state, so the false world seems to be a field of action and gain to the deluded man.

5. As one not knowing what is gold, views a golden bracelet as a mere bracelet, and not as gold (_i.e._ who takes the form and not the substance for reality); so are the ignorant ever misled by formal appearances, without a knowledge of the causal element.

6. As the ignorant view a city, a house, a hill and an elephant, as they are presented before him; so the visibles are all taken only as they are seen, and not what they really are.

7. As strings of pearls are seen in the sunny sky, and various paints and taints in the plumage of the peacock; so the phenomenal world, presents its false appearances for sober realities.

8. Know life as a long sleep, and the world with myself and thyself, are the visions of its dream; we see many other persons in this sleepy dream, none of whom is real, as you will now learn from me.

9. There is but one All-pervading, quiet, and spiritually substantial reality. It is of the form of unintelligible intellect, and an immense outspreading vacuity.

10. It is omnipotent, and all in all by itself, and is of the form as it manifests itself everywhere.

11. Hence the citizens that you see in this visionary city, are but transient forms of men, presented in your dream by that Omnipotent Being.

12. The mind of the viewer, remains in its self-same state amidst the sphere of his dreams, and represents the images thought of by itself in that visionary sphere of mankind. (So the Divine Mind presents its various images to the sight of men in this visionary sphere of the 208421 world, which has nothing substantial in it).

208422
208423 13. The knowing mind has the same knowledge of things, both in 208424 its waking as well as dreaming states; and it is by an act of the 208425 percipient mind, that this knowledge is imprinted as true in the 208426 conscious souls of men.

208427
208428 14. Ráma said:—If the persons seen in the dream are unreal, then tell 208429 me sir, what is that fault in the embodied soul, which makes them
208430 appear as realities.

208431
208432 15. Vasishtha replied:—The cities and houses, which are seen in dreams
208433 are in reality nothing. It is only the illusion (máýá) of the embodied 208434 soul, which makes them appear as true like those seen in the waking 208435 state, in this visionary world.

208436
208437 16. I will tell you in proof of this, that in the beginning of creation 208438 the self-born Brahmá himself, had the notions of all created things, in 208439 the form of visionary appearances, as in a dream and their subsequent 208440 development, by the will of the creator; hence their creator is as 208441 unreal as their notions and appearances in the dream.

208442
208443 17. Learn then this truth of me, that this world is a dream, and that 208444 you and all other men have your sleeping dreams, contained in your 208445 waking dreams of this visionary world. (_i.e._ The one is a night dream 208446 and the other a day dream, and equally untrue in their substance).

208447
208448 18. If the scenes that are seen in your sleeping dream, have no reality 208449 in them, how then can you expect those in your day dreams to be real at 208450 all?

208451
208452 19. As you take me for a reality, so do I also take you and all other 208453 things for realities likewise, and such is the case with every body in 208454 this world of dreams.

208455
208456 20. As I appear an entity to you in this world of lengthened dreams; so 208457 you too appear an actual entity to me; and so it is with all in their 208458 protracted dreaming.

208459
208460 21. Ráma asked:—If both these states of dreaming are alike, then tell 208461 me, why the dreamer in sleep, does not upon his waking, think the 208462 visions in his dream, to be as real as those of his day dreaming state?

208463
208464 22. Vasishtha replied:—Yes, the day dreaming is of the same nature as 208465 night dreams, in which the dreamt objects appear to be real; but it is 208466 upon the waking from the one, as upon the death of the day dreamer, 208467 that both these visions are found to vanish in empty air.

208468
208469 23. As the objects of your night dreams do not subsist in time or 208470 place upon your waking, so also those of your day dream, can have no
208471 subsistence upon death.

208472
208473 24. Thus is every thing unreal, which appears real for the present, and 208474 it disappears into an airy nothing at last, though it might appear as 208475 charming as a fairy form in the dream.

208476
208477 25. There is one Intelligence that fills all space, and appears as 208478 every thing both within and without every body; It is only by our 208479 illusive conception of it, that we take it in different lights.

208480
208481 26. As one picks up a jewel he happens to meet with in a treasure 208482 house, so do we lay hold on any thing, with which the vast Intellect is 208483 filled according to our own liking. (Here we find the free agency of 208484 human will).

208485
208486 27. The goddess of intelligence, having thus caused the germ of true 208487 knowledge, to sprout forth in the mind of the prince, by sprinkling the 208488 ambrosial drops of her wisdom over it, thus spake to him in the end:—
208489

208490 28. I have told you all this for the sake of Lílá, and now, good 208491 prince, we shall take leave of you, and these illusory scenes of the 208492 world.

208493
208494 29. Vasishtha said:—The intelligent prince, being thus gently
208495 addressed by the goddess of wisdom, besought her in a submissive tone.
208496

208497 30. Vidúratha said:—Your visit, O most bounteous goddess, cannot go 208498 for nothing, when we poor mortals cannot withhold our bounty from our 208499 suppliant visitants.

208500
208501 31. I will quit this body to repair to another world, as one passes 208502 from one chain of dreams into another.

208503
208504 32. Look upon me, thy suppliant, with kindness, and deign to confer 208505 the favour I ask of thee; because the great never disdain to grant the 208506 prayers of their suppliants.

208507
208508 33. Ordain that this virgin daughter of my minister, may accompany me
208509 to the region, where I shall be led, that we may have spiritual joy in 208510 each other's company hereafter.

208511
208512 34. Sarasvatí said:—Go now prince to the former palace of your past 208513 life, and there reign without fear, in the enjoyment of true pleasure.
208514 Know prince, that our visits never fail to fulfil the best wishes of 208515 our supplicants.

208516 208517 208518 208519 208520 CHAPTER XLIII.

208521 208522 BURNING OF THE CITY.

208524
208525 The goddess added:—Know further, O prince! that you are destined to 208526 fall in this great battle, and will have your former realm, presented 208527 to you in the same manner as before.

208528
208529 2. Your minister and his maiden daughter will accompany you to your 208530 former city, and you shall enter your lifeless corpse, lying in state 208531 in the palace.

208532
208533 3. We shall fly there as winds before you, and you will follow us 208534 accompanied by the minister and his virgin daughter as one returning to 208535 his native country.

208536
208537 4. Your courses thereto will be as slow or swift as those of horses, 208538 elephants, asses, or camels, but our course is quite different from any 208539 of these.

208540
208541 5. As the prince and the goddess were going on with this sweet
208542 conversation, there arrived a man on horse back before them in great 208543 hurry and confusion.

208544
208545 6. He said:—Lord! I come to tell that, there are showers of darts and 208546 disks, and swords and clubs, falling upon us as rain, from the hostile
208547 forces, and they have been forcing upon us as a flood on all sides.

208548
208549 7. They have been raining their heavy weapons upon us at pleasure, like 208550 fragments of rocks hurled down from the heads of high hills, by the 208551 impetuous gusts of a hurricane.

208552
208553 8. There they have set fire to our rock-like city, which like a wild
208554 fire, is raging on all sides. It is burning and ravaging with _chat 208555 chat_ sounds, and hurling the houses with a hideous noise.

208556
208557 9. The smoke rising as heaving hills, have overspread the skies like 208558 diluvian clouds; and the flame of fire, ascending on high, resembles the phoenix flying in the sky.

10. Vasishtha said:—As the royal marshal was delivering with trepidation this unpleasant intelligence, there arose a loud cry without, filling the sky with its uproar (hallahalloo-kolá halam).

11. The twanging (tankára) of bow strings drawn to the ears, the rustling (sarsara) of flying arrows flung with full force; the loud roaring (bringhana) of furious elephants, and the shrieks (chitkára) of frightened ones.

12. The gorgeous elephants bursting in the city with a clattering (chatchata) sound; and the high halloos (halahala) of citizens, whose houses have been burnt down on the ground:—(Here dagdhadára _Arabic_ daghdaghad-dár, means both a burnt house and also a burnt wife).

13. The falling and flying of burnt embers with a crackling noise (tankára); and the burning of raging fire with a hoarse sound (dhaghdhaga _Arabic_ daghdagha, _Bengali_ dhakdhak):—

14. All these were heard and seen by the goddesses and the prince and his minister, from an opening of the tent; and the city was found to be in a blaze in the darkness of the night.

15. It was as the conflagration or fiery ocean of the last day, and the city was covered by clouds of the hostile army, with their flashing weapons, waving on all sides.

16. The flame rose as high as the sky, melted down big edifices like hills by the all dissolving fire of destruction.

17. Bodies of thick clouds roared on high, and threatened the people, like the clamour (kala-kala) of the gangs of stout robbers, that were gathered on the ground for plunder and booty.

18. The heavens were hidden under clouds of smoke, rolling as the shades of Pushkara and Ávarta, and the flames of fire, were flashing, like the golden peaks of Meru.

19. Burning cinders and sparks of fire, were glittering like meteors and stars in the sky; and the blazing houses and towers glared as burning mountains in the midst.

20. The relics of the forces were beset by the spreading flames of clouds of fire, and the half burnt citizens (with their bitter cries), were kept from flight, for fear of the threatening enemy abroad.

21. Sleet of arrowy sparks flying in the air on all sides, and showers of weapons falling in every way, burnt and pierced the citizens in large numbers.

22. The greatest and most expert champions, were crashed under the feet of elephants in fighting; and the roads were heaped with treasures, wrested from the robbers in their retreat.

23. There were wailings of men and women at the falling of fire-brands upon them; and the splitting of splinters and the slitting of timbers emitted a _phat-phat_ noise all around.

24. Big blocks of burning wood were blown up, blazing as burning suns in the air; and heaps of embers filled the face of the earth with living fire.

25. The cracking of combustible woods and the bursting of burning bamboos, the cries of the parched brutes and the howling of the soldiers, re-echoed in the air.

26. The flaming fire was quenched after consuming the royalty to ashes, and the devouring flame ceased after it had reduced everything to cinders.

27. The sudden outbreak of the fire was as the outburst of house breaking robbers upon the sleeping inhabitants; and it made its prey of everything (whether living or lifeless), that fell in its way.

28. At this moment the prince Vidúratha heard a voice, proceeding from his soldiers, at the sight of their wives flying from the scorching flames.

29. Oh! the high winds, that have blown the flames to the tops of our household trees, with their rustling sound (kharakhara) and hindered our taking shelter under their cooling umbrage.

30. Woe for the burning of our wives, who were as cold as frost to our bodies before (by their assuaging the smart of every pain); and whose ashes now rest in our breasts, like the lime of shells, i.e. in the sublimated state of spiritual bodies (súkshma-dehas).

31. Oh! the mighty power of fire, that has set to flame the forelocks of our fair damsels, and is burning the braids of their hair, like blades of grass or straws.

32. The curling smoke is ascending on high, like a whirling and long meandering river in the air, and the black and white fumes of fire, resemble the dark stream of Yamuná in one place, and the milky path of the etherial Gangá in another.

33. Streams of smoke bearing the brands of fire on high, dazzled the sight of the charioteers of heaven by their bubbling sparks.

34. There are our fathers, mothers, brothers, sisters, relations and suckling babes, all burnt alive in the livid flames; and here are we burning in grief for them in these houses, which have been spared by the devouring fire.

35. Lo! there the howling fire is fast stretching to these abodes, and here the cinders are falling as thick as the frost of Meru.

36. Behold the direful darts and missiles dropping down as the driving rain, and penetrating the windows, like bodies of gnats in the shade of evening.

37. The flashing spears and flaming fire, flaring above the watery ocean of the sky, resemble the submarine fire ascending to heaven.

38. The smoke is rising in clouds, and the flames are tapering in the form of towers, and all that was humid and verdant, is sucked and dried up, as the hearts of the dispassionate.

39. The trees are broken down by the raging element, like posts of enraged elephants; and they are falling with a cracking noise (kata-kata), as if they were screaming at their fall.

40. The trees in the orchards, now flourishing in their luxuriance of fruits and flowers, are left bare by the burning fire, like householders bereft of their properties.

41. Boys abandoned by their parents in the darkness of the night, were either pierced by flying arrows or crushed under the falling houses, in their flight through the streets.

42. The elephants posted at the front of the army, got frightened at the flying embers driven by the winds, and fled with loud screaming at the fall of the burning houses upon them.

43. Oh! the pain of being put to the sword, is not more grievous, than that of being burnt by the fire, or smashed under the stones of the thundering engine.

208697
208698 44. The streets are filled with domestic animals and cattle of all 208699 kinds, that are let loose from their folds and stalls, to raise their 208700 commingled cries like the confused noise of battle in the blocked up 208701 paths.
208702

208703 45. The weeping women were passing as lotus flowers on land, with 208704 their lotus like faces and feet and palms, and drops of tears fell 208705 like fluttering bees from their lotiform eyes and wet apparel upon the 208706 ground.
208707

208708 46. The red taints and spots of _alakávali_, blazed as _asoka_ flowers
208709 upon their foreheads and cheeks.
208710

208711 47. Alack for pity! that the furious flame of fire, should singe the 208712 black bee-like eyelids of our deer-eyed fairies; like the ruthless 208713 victor, that delights in his acts of inhumanity.
208714

208715 48. O the bond of connubial love! that the faithful wife never fails to 208716 follow her burning lord, and cremates herself in the same flame with 208717 him (this shows the practice of concremation to be older than the days 208718 of Válmíki and Viswámíttra).
208719

208720 49. The elephant being burnt in his trunk, in breaking the burning 208721 post to which he was tied by the leg, ran with violence to a lake of 208722 lotuses, in which he fell dead. (Here is a play upon the homonymous 208723 word "pushkara," in its triple sense of a lake, a lotus and the 208724 proboscis of an elephant).
208725

208726 50. The flames of fire flashing like flitting lightnings amidst the 208727 clouds of smoke in the air, were darting the darts of burning coals
208728 like bolts of thunder in showers.
208729

208730 51. Lord! the sparks of fire sparkling amidst the dusky clouds, appear 208731 as glittering gems in the bosom of the airy ocean, and seem by their 208732 twirling to gird the crown of heaven with the girdle of Pleiades.
208733

208734 52. The sky was reddened by the light of the flaming fires, and 208735 appeared as the courtyard of Death dyed with purple hues in joy for 208736 reception of the souls of the dead.
208737

208738 53. Alas! the day and want of manners! that the royal dames are carried 208739 away by these armed ruffians by force. (_O tempores O mores_).
208740

208741 54. Behold them dragged in the streets from their stately edifices, and 208742 strewing their paths with wreaths of flowers torn from their necks;
208743 while their half burnt locks are hanging loosely upon their bare 208744 breasts and bosoms.
208745

208746 55. Lo! their loose raiments uncovering their backs and loins, and the 208747 jewels dropt down, from their wrists, have strewn the ground with gems.
208748

208749 56. Their necklaces are torn and their pearls are scattered about;
208750 their bodies are bared of their bodices, and their breasts appear to 208751 view in their golden hue.
208752

208753 57. Their shrill cries and groans rising above the war cry, choked 208754 their breath and split their sides; and they fell insensible with their 208755 eyes dimmed by ceaseless floods of tears.
208756

208757 58. They fell in a body with their arms twisted about the necks of one 208758 another, and the ends of their cloths tied to each other's; and in 208759 this way they were dragged by force of the ruffians, with their bodies
208760 mangled in blood.
208761

208762 59. "Ah! who will save them from this state," cried the royal soldiers, 208763 with their piteous looks on the sad plight of the females and shedding
208764 big drops of their tears like lotuses.
208765

208766 60. The bright face of the sky turned black at the horrible sight, and 208767 it looked with its blue lotus-like eyes of the clouds, on the fair 208768 lotus-like damsels thus scattered on the ground.
208769

208770 61. Thus was the goddess of royal prosperity, decorated as she was with 208771 her waving and pendant locks, her flowing garments, flowery chaplets
208772 and gemming ornaments brought to her end like these ladies, after her 208773 enjoyment of the pleasures of royalty and gratification of all her 208774 desires.

208779 CHAPTER XLIV.

208780 SPIRITUAL INTERPRETATION OF THE VISION.

208781
208782
208783
208784 Vasishtha said:—At this instant the great queen, who was in the bloom
208785 of youthful beauty, entered the camp of Vidúratha, as the goddess of 208786 grace pops upon the lotus flower.
208787

208788 2. She was decorated with pendant wreaths of flowers and necklaces, and 208789 accompanied by a train of her youthful companions and handmaids, all 208790 terrified with fear.
208791

208792 3. With her face as bright as the moon and her form as fair as the 208793 lily, she appeared as a luminary of heaven, with her teeth shining as 208794 sets of stars, and her bosom throbbing with fear.
208795

208796 4. Then the king was informed by one of her companions about the fate
208797 of the warfare, which resembled the onset of demons upon the Apsará 208798 tribe.
208799

208800 5. Lord! this lady, said she, has fled with us from her seraglio, to 208801 take refuge under thy arms, as a tender creeper seeks the shelter of a 208802 tree, from a rude gust of wind.
208803

208804 6. Behold! the ravishers ravishing the wives of the citizens with their 208805 uplifted arms, like the swelling waves of the sea carrying away the 208806 harbours of the bank in their rapid current.
208807

208808 7. The guards of the royal harem are all crushed to death by the 208809 haughty marauders, as the sturdy trees of the forest are broken down by 208810 the furious tornado.
208811

208812 8. Our armies frightened by the enemy from afar, dare not approach the 208813 falling city, as nobody ventures to rescue the lotus beds from a flood,
208814 under the threatening thunders of a rainy night.
208815

208816 9. The hostile force have poured upon the city in terrible numbers, and 208817 having set it on fire, are shouting loudly under the clouds of smoke, 208818 with their weapons brandishing on all sides.
208819

208820 10. The handsome ladies are dragged by the hair from amidst their 208821 families, in the manner of screaming cranes, caught and carried away by 208822 the cruel fowlers and fishermen.
208823

208824 11. Now we have brought this exuberant tender creeper to thee, that 208825 thou mayst save her from similar fate by thy might.
208826

208827 12. Hearing this, he looked at the goddesses and said, now will I go 208828 to the war from here, and leave this my lady as an humble bee at your 208829 lotus feet.
208830

208831 13. Saying so, the king rose in a rage from his seat and sprang like 208832 the enraged lion from the den, when pierced and pressed by the tusk of 208833 a furious elephant.
208834

208835 14. The widowed Lílá beheld the queen Lílá to be exactly of her form 208836 and features, and took her for a true inflexion of herself in a mirror.
208837

208838 15. Then said the enlightened Lílá to Sarasvatí:—Tell me, O goddess!
208839 how this lady here is exactly as myself, she is what I have been 208840 before, and how she came to be as myself.
208841

208842 16. I see this prime minister with all these soldiers and citizens, 208843 these forces and vehicles, to be the same as mine, and situated in the 208844 same place and manner as before.
208845

208846 17. How is it then, O goddess! that they came to be placed in this 208847 place. I see them as Images situated within and without the mirror of 208848 my mind, and know not whether these be living beings (or the false 208849 chimeras of my imagination).
208850

208851 18. Sarasvatí replied:—All our external perceptions of things, are the 208852 immediate effects of our internal conceptions of them. The intellect 208853 has the knowledge of all the intelligibles in it, as the mind has the 208854 impressions of mental objects in itself. (Or in other words:—the 208855 intellect is possessed of all intelligence, like the mind of its 208856 thoughts, as they present themselves in dreams. Gloss).
208857

208858 19. The external world appears in an instant in the same form and 208859 manner to one, as he has its notion and impression in his intellect and 208860 mind; and no distance of time or place, nor any intermediate cause can 208861 create any difference in them.
208862

208863 20. The inward world is seen on the outside, as the internal 208864 impressions of our minds, appear to be seen without us in our dreams.
208865 Whatever is within us, the same appears without us, as in our dreams
208866 and desires, and in all our imaginations and fancies of objects.
208867

208868 21. It is the constant habitude of your mind, that presented these 208869 things as realities to your sight, and you saw your husband in the same 208870 state in which you thought him to be, when he died in that city of 208871 yours.
208872

208873 22. It is the same place wherein he exists at present, and is presented 208874 with the same objects of his thought at present as he had at that 208875 moment. Any thing that appears to be different in this state, proceeds 208876 from the turn of his mind of thinking it so before.
208877

208878 23. All that appears real to him, is as unreal as his dream or 208879 desire, and the creation of his fancy; for every thing appears to be 208880 the same as it is thought of in the mind. (All external objects are 208881 representations of their prototypes in the mind).
208882

208883 24. Say therefore what truth can there be in these visionary objects, 208884 which are altogether unsubstantial as dreams, and vanish in the end
208885 into airy nothing.
208886

208887 25. Know then every thing to be no better than nothing; and as a dream
208888 proves to be nothing upon waking, so is waking also a dream and equally 208889 nothing at death.
208890

208891 26. Death in life time is a nullity, and life in death becomes null 208892 and extinct; and these extinctions of life and death, proceed from the 208893 fluctuating nature of our notions of them.
208894

208895 27. So there is neither any entity nor nonentity either, but both 208896 appear to us as fallacies by turns. For what neither was before, nor 208897 will be, after a Kalpa = creation or dissolution, the same cannot 208898 exist to-day or in any Yuga = age, whether gone before or coming 208899 afterwards.
208900

208901 28. That which is never inexistent, is the ever existent Brahma, and 208902 the same is the world. It is in him that we see everything to rise and 208903 fall by our fallacy, and what we falsely term as the creation or the created.

29. As phantoms appearing in the vacuum, are all vacant and void, and as the waves of the sea, are no other than its water; so do these created things exist and appear in Brahma only.

30. As the minutiae appearing in the air, vanish in the air; and as the dust driven by the winds, are lost in the winds; so the false notions of yourself and myself, are lost in that Supreme self, in which all things rise and fall like waves of the ocean.

31. What reliance can there be in this dust of creation, which is no more than the water of the mirage? The knowledge of individualities is mere fallacy, when every thing is united in that sole unity.

32. We see apparitions in the dark, though the darkness itself is no apparition; so our lives and deaths are the false notions of our error, and the whole existence is equally the production of gross error (máya).

33. All this is Himself, for He is the great Kalpa or will which produces every thing; it is He that exists when all things are extinct in Him; and therefore these appearances, are neither real nor unreal of themselves.

34. But to say both (the real and unreal) to be Brahma, is a contradiction; therefore it is He, who fills the infinity of space, and abides equally in all things and their minutest particles.

35. Wherever the spirit of Brahma abides, and even in the minute animalcule, it views the whole world in itself; like one thinking on the heat and cold of fire and frost, has the same sensation within himself at that moment. (Vide Hume).

36. So doth the pure intellect perceive the Holy Spirit of God within itself, just as one sees the particles of light flying in his closet at sunrise.

37. So do these multitudes of worlds, move about as particles in the infinite space of the Divine mind, as the particles of odoriferous substances oscillate in the empty air.

38. In this manner does this world abide in its incorporeal state in the mind of God, with all its modifications of existence and inexistence, emanation and absorption, of its condensation and subtilization and its mobility and rest.

39. But you must know all these modes and these conditions of being to belong to material bodies only and not to the spirit, which is unconditioned and indivisible (_i.e._ without attributes and parts).

40. And as there is no change or division of one's own soul, so there is no partition or variation of the Supreme Spirit. It is according to the ideas in our minds, that we view things in their different aspects before us.

41. Yet the word world-visva-all, is not a meaningless term; it means the all as contained in Brahma (who is to pan). Therefore it is both real and unreal at the same time like the fallacy of a snake in a rope.

42. It is the false notion (of the snake), that makes the true (rope) to appear as the untrue snake to us, which we are apt to take for the true snake itself, so we take the Divine Intellect, which is the prime cause of all, as a living soul (like ours), by mistake.

43. It is this notion (of the living soul), that makes us to think ourselves as living beings, which whether it be false or true, is like the appearance of the world in empty air.

208973 44. Thus these little animals delight themselves with their own 208974 misconceived idea of being living beings, while there are others who 208975 think themselves so, by their preconceived notions as such.
208976
208977 45. Some there are that have no preconceived notions, and others that 208978 retain the same as or somewhat different notions of themselves than 208979 before. Somewhere the inborn notions are predominant, and sometimes 208980 they are entirely lost.
208981
208982 46. Our preconceived notions of ourselves, represent unrealities as 208983 realities to our minds, and present the thoughts of our former family 208984 and birth, and the same occupations and professions before us (as also 208985 the enjoyments we had before and no more existent at present).
208986
208987 47. Such are the representations of your former ministers and citizens, 208988 imprinted as realities in your soul, together with the exact time and 208989 place and manner of their functions, as before.
208990
208991 48. And as the intelligence of all things, is present in the omniscient 208992 spirit of God, so is the idea of royalty inherent in the soul of the 208993 prince (_i.e._ like the ex-king Lear, he thinks himself every inch a 208994 king).
208995
208996 49. This notion of his goes before him as his shadow in the air, with 208997 the same stature and features, and the same acts and movements as he 208998 had before.
208999
209000 50. In this manner, Lílá! Know this world to be but a shadowy reflexion 209001 of the eternal ideas of God; and this reflection is caught by or 209002 refracted in the consciousness of all animal souls as in a prismatic
209003 mirror.
209004
209005 51. Everything shows itself in every place in the form in which it
209006 is; so whatever there is in the living soul, casts out a reflexion 209007 of itself, and a shadow of it is caught by the intellect, which is 209008 situated without it. (The mind is a mirror of the images in the soul).
209009
209010 52. Here is the sky containing the world, which contains this earth, 209011 wherein you and myself and this prince are situated, as reflexions of 209012 the One Ego only. Know all these to be contained within the vacuous 209013 womb of the Intellect, and to remain as tranquil and transparent as 209014 vacuity itself.
209015
209016
209017
209018
209019
209020

209021 CHAPTER XLV.

209022 THEISM CONSISTING IN TRUE KNOWLEDGE.

209023
209024 Sarasvatí continued:—Know Lílá! this Vidúratha, thy husband, will 209025 lose his life in this battle-field; and his soul will repair to the 209026 sepulchre in the inner apartment, where it will resume its former state.
209027

209028 2. Upon hearing these words of the goddess, the second Lílá, who was 209029 standing by, bent herself lowly before the goddess, and addressed her 209030 with her folded palms.
209031

209032 3. The second Lílá's speech. Goddess! the genius of intelligence is 209033 ever adored by me, and she gives me her visits in my nightly dreams.
209034

209035 4. I find thee here exactly of her likeness; therefore give me thy 209036 blessing, thou goddess with the beauteous face.
209037

209038 5. Vasishtha said:—The goddess being thus addressed by the lady, 209039 remembered her faith and reliance in her, and then spake with 209040 complacence to the lady standing suppliant before her.
209041

- 209042 6. The goddess said:—I am pleased my child, with thy unfailing and 209043 unslakened adoration of me all thy lifetime; now say what thou askest 209044 of me.
- 209045
- 209046 7. The second Lílá said:—Ordain O goddess, that I may accompany my 209047 husband with this body of mine to whatever place he is destined to go, 209048 after his death in the war.
- 209049
- 209050 8. The goddess replied:—Be it so my child; that hast worshipped 209051 me with all diligence and without fail, with flowers, incense and 209052 offerings.
- 209053
- 209054 9. Vasishtha said:—The second Lílá being gladdened by this blessing 209055 of the goddess, the first Lílá, was much puzzled in her mind at the 209056 difference of their states.
- 209057
- 209058 10. The first Lílá said:—Those who are desirous of truth, and they 209059 whose desires lean towards godliness, have all their wishes fulfilled 209060 without delay and fail.
- 209061
- 209062 11. Then tell me, goddess! why could I not keep company with my 209063 Bráhmāna husband with my body of the Bráhmaṇi, but had to be taken 209064 to him in the hilly mansion after my death, (and reproduction in the 209065 present form).
- 209066
- 209067 12. The goddess answered saying:—Know O excellent lady! that I have no 209068 power to do anything; but every thing happens to pass according to the 209069 desire of the living being.
- 209070
- 209071 13. Know me only as the presiding divinity of wisdom, and I reveal 209072 everything according to my knowledge of it. It is by virtue of the 209073 intellectual powers as exhibited in every being, that it attains its 209074 particular end.
- 209075
- 209076 14. It is according to the development of the mental powers of living 209077 beings in every state, that it obtains its object in the manner and in 209078 the same state as it aims at.
- 209079
- 209080 15. You had attained the powers of your understanding by your 209081 devotedness to my service, and have always desired of me for being 209082 liberated from flesh.
- 209083
- 209084 16. I have accordingly awakened your understanding in that way, whereby 209085 you have been able to arrive at your present state of purity.
- 209086
- 209087 17. It was by cause of your constant desire of liberation, that you 209088 have gained the same state, by enlargement (of the powers) of your 209089 intellect.
- 209090
- 209091 18. Whoever exerts his bodily powers according to the dictates of his 209092 understanding, is sure to succeed in gaining his object sooner or later.
- 209093
- 209094 19. Performance of austerities and adoration of gods, are as vain 209095 without cultivation of the intellect, as to expect the falling of 209096 fruits from the sky.
- 209097
- 209098 20. Without cultivation of the intellect and exertion of manly powers, 209099 there is no way to success; do therefore as you may choose for yourself.
- 209100
- 209101 21. It is verily the state of one's mind, that leads his internal soul
209102 to that state which it thinks upon, and to that prosperity which it 209103 attempts to obtain. 22. Now distinguish between what is desirable or 209104 disagreeable to you, and choose that which is holy and perfect, and you 209105 will certainly arrive to it.
- 209106
- 209107

ONSLAUGHT OF VIDÚRATHA.

Rāma said:—Relate to me the acts of Vidúratha, after he went out enraged from the camp, and left the ladies and the goddess talking in that manner.

2. Vasishtha said:—Vidúratha left his camp in company with a large body of his companions like the bright moon beset by a host of stars.

3. He was in armour and girt by laces and girdles, and thus attired in his martial habit, he went forth amidst the loud war cry of _vae victis_, like the god Indra going to battle.

4. He gave orders to the soldiers and was informed of the battle array; and having given directions to his captains, he mounted his chariot.

5. It was adorned with mountings resembling the pinnacles of mountains and beset by five flags fringed with strings of pearls and gems, resembling a celestial car.

6. The iron hoops of its wheels flashed with their golden pegs, and the long and beautiful shaft of the car, rang with the tinkling of pearls which were suspended to it.

7. It was drawn by long necked, swift and slender horses of the best breed and auspicious marks; that seemed to fly in the air by their swiftness and bearing aloft a heavenly car with some god in it.

8. Being impatient of the swiftness of the winds, they spurred them with their hinder heels and left them behind, and sped the forepart of their bodies as if to devour the air, impeding their course.

9. The car was drawn by eight coursers with their manes hanging down their necks like flappers, and white spots or circlets resembling the disks of moon on their foreheads, and filling the eight sides around with their hoarse neighing. 10. At this time there rose a loud noise of the elephants, resounding like drums from the hollows of the distant hills.

11. Loud clamours (kala-kalas) were raised by the infuriate soldiers, and the tinkling of their belted trinkets (kinkini), and clashing of their weapons, rang afar in the open air.

12. The crackling (chatachata) of the bows, and the wheezing (shitkara) of the arrows, joined with the jangle (jhanjhana) of armours, by their clashing against one another, raised a confused hubbub all around.

13. The sparkling (kanatkara) of blazing fire, and the mutual challenge of the champions; the painful shrieks of the wounded and the piteous cry of captives, were seen and heard on all sides.

14. The mingled sounds thickened in the air, and filled its cavity and its sides as with solid stones and capable of being clutched in the hands.

15. Clouds of dust flew as fast and thick into the air, that they seemed to be the crust or strata of the earth, rising upward to block the path of the sun in the sky.

16. The great city was hid in the dark womb of the overspreading dust (rajas), as the ignorant state of man is covered in darkness by the rising passion (rajas) of juvenescence.

17. The burning lights became as dim, as the fading stars of heaven by day light, and the darkness of night became as thick, as the devils of darkness gather their strength at night.

18. The two Lílás saw the great battle with the virgin daughter of the minister from the tent; and they had their eyes enlightened with farsightedness by favour of the goddess.

19. Now there was an end of the flashing and clashing of the hostile arms in the city, as the flash and crash of submarine fires were put to an end by the all-submerging floods of the universal deluge.

20. Vidúratha collected his forces and without considering the superiority of the hostile power pressed himself forward amidst them, as the great Meru rushed into the waters of the great deluge.

21. Now the twanging of the bow strings emitted a clattering (Chatachata) sound; and the forces of the enemy advanced in battle array, like bodies of clouds with rainbows amidst them.

22. Many kinds of missiles flew as falcons in the air; and the black steel waved with a dark glare owing to the massacres they made.

23. The clashing swords flashed with living flames of fire by their striking against one another; and showers of arrows whistled like hissing rainfalls in the air.

24. Two edged saws pierced the bodies of the warriors; and the flinging weapons hurtled in the air by their clashing at and crashing of each other.

25. The darkness of the night was put to flight by the blaze of the weapons; and the whole army was pierced by arrows, sticking as the hairs on their bodies.

26. Headless trunks moved about as players in the horrid solemnity of the god of death (Yama); and the furies fled about at the dint of war, like the raving lasses at Bacchanal revelries.

27. Elephants fighting with their tusks, sent a clattering noise in the air; and the stones flung from the slings, flew as a flowing stream in the sky.

28. Bodies of men were falling dead on the ground, like the dried leaves of forests blown away by blasts; and streams of blood were running in the field of battle, as if the heights of war were pouring down the floods of death below.

29. The dust of the earth was set down by the floods of blood, and the darkness was dispelled by the blaze of weapons; all clamour ceased in intense fighting, and the fear for life, was lost under the stern resolution of death.

30. The fighting was stern without a cry or noise, like the pouring of rain in the breezeless sky, and with the glitter of swords in the darkened air, like the flashes of forked lightnings amidst the murky clouds.

31. The darts were flying about with a hissing noise (khad-khada); and the crow-bars hit one another with a harsh (taktaka) sound; large weapons were struck upon one another with a jarring noise (jhanjhana), and the dreadful war raged direfully in the dim darkness (timitimi) of the night.

CHAPTER XLVII.

ENCOUNTER OF SINDHU AND VIDÚRATHA.

Vasishtha said:—As the war was waging thus furiously between the two armies, the two Lílás addressed the goddess of knowledge and said:-

2. "Tell us, O goddess! what unknown cause prevents our husband to gain the victory in this war, notwithstanding your good grace to him, and his repelling the hostile elephants in the combat".

3. Sarasvatí replied:-Know ye daughters, that I was ever solicited by Vidúratha's enemy to confer him victory in battle, which your husband never craved of me.

4. He lives and enjoys his life as it was desired by him, while his antagonist gains the conquest according to his aim and object.

5. Knowledge is contained in the consciousness of every living being, and rewards every one according to the desire to which it is directed.

6. My nature like that of all things is as unchangeable as the heat of fire (which never changes to cold). So the nature of Vidúratha's knowledge of truth, and his desire of liberation lead him to the like result (and not to victory).

7. The intelligent Lílá also will be liberated with him, and not the unintelligent one, who by her nature is yet unprepared for that highest state of bliss.

8. This enemy of Vidúratha, the king of Sinde, has long worshipped me for his victory in war; whereby the bodies of Vidúratha and his wife must fall into his hands.

9. Thou girl wilt also have thy liberation like hers in course of time; but ere that, this enemy of yours,-the king of Sinde, will reign victorious in this earth.

10. Vasishtha said:-As the goddess was speaking in this manner, the sun appeared on his rising hill to behold the wondrous sight of the forces in fighting.

11. The thick mists of night disappeared like the hosts of the enemy (Sinde); and left the forces of Vidúratha to glitter as stars at the approach of night.

12. The hills and dales and the land and water gradually appeared to sight, and the world seemed to reappear to view from amidst the dark ocean of the (deluge).

13. The bright rays of the rising sun radiated on all sides like the streams of liquid gold, and made the hills appear as the bodies of warriors besmeared with (blood).

14. The sky seemed as an immense field of battle, stretched over by the radiant rays of the sun (Karas), likening the shining arms (Karas) of the warriors, shaking in their serpentine mood.

15. The helmets on their heads raised their lotus-like tops on high, and the rings about their ears blazed with their gemming glare below.

16. The pointed weapons were as fixed as the snouts of unicorns, and the flying darts fled about as butterflies in the air. The bloody field presented a picture of the ruddy dawn and dusk, and the dead bodies on the ground, represented the figures of motionless saints in their Yoga.

17. Necklaces like snakes overhung their breasts, and the armours like sloughs of serpents covered their bodies. The flags were flying like crests of creepers on high, and the legs of the warriors stood as pillars in the field.

18. Their long arms were as branches of trees, and the arrows formed a bush of reeds; the flash of weapons spread as a verdant meadow all around, while their blades blazed with the lustre of the long-leaved

_ketaka_ flowers.

19. The long lines of weapons formed as rows of bamboos and bushes of brambles, and their mutual clashing emitted sparks of fire like clusters of the red _asoka_ flowers.

20. The bands of Siddhas were flying away with their leaders from the air, to avert the weapons which were blazing there with the radiance of the rising sun, and forming as it were, a city of gold on high.

21. The sky re-echoed to the clashing of darts and discuses, of swords and spears and of mallets and clubs in the field; and the ground was overflowed by streams of blood, bearing away the dead bodies of the slain.

22. The land was strewn with crowbars, lances and spears, and with tridents and stones on all sides; and headless bodies were falling hideously, pierced by poles and pikes and other instruments of death.

23. The ghosts and goblins of death were making horrible noise above, and the shining cars of Sindhu and Vidúratha, moved with a loud rumbling below.

24. They appeared as the two luminaries of the sun and moon in heaven, and equipped with their various weapons of disks and rods, of crowbars and spears, and other missiles besides.

25. They were both surrounded by thousands of soldiers, and turned about as they liked, with loud shouts of their retainers.

26. Crushed under heavy disks, many fell dead and wounded with loud cries; and big elephants were floating lightly on the currents of blood.

27. The hairs on the heads of dead bodies, floated like weeds in the stream of blood, and the floating discuses glided like the disks of the moon, reflected in the purple streamlet.

28. The jingling (jhanat) of gemming ornaments, and the tinkling (ranat) bells of war carriages, with the flapping (patat) of flags by the wind, filled the field with a confused noise.

29. Numbers of valiant as well as dastardly soldiers followed their respective princes, some bleeding under the spears of Kuntas and others pierced by the arrows of bowyers.

30. Then the two princes turned round their chariots in circling rings over the ground, and amidst phalanxes armed with all sorts of destructive weapons.

31. Each confronted the other with his arms, and having met one another face to face, commenced showering forth his arrows with the pattering sound of hailstones.

32. They both threatened one another with the roaring of loud surges and clouds, and the two lions among men, darted their arrows upon one another in their rage.

33. They flung their missiles in the air in the form of stones and mallets, and some faced like swords, and others headed as mallets.

34. Some were as sharp edged disks, and some as curved as battle axes; some were as pointed as pikes and spears, and others as bars and rods in their forms, and some were of the shape of tridents, and others as bulky as blocks of stones.

35. These missiles were falling as fully and as fast as blocks of stones, which are hurled down from high and huge rocks, by gusts of blustering hurricanes. And the meeting of the two armigerent powers, was as the confluence of the Indus and the sea, with tremendous 209387 roaring, and mutual collision and clashing.

209391
209392 CHAPTER XLVIII.

209393
209394 DESCRIPTION OF DAIVÁSTRAS OR SUPERNATURAL WEAPONS.[23]

209395
209396 Vasishtha said:—Rájá Vidúratha, finding the high shouldered 209397 Sindhu-rája before him, was enraged like the raging sun, in his mid-day 209398 fury.

209399
209400 2. The twanging of his bow resounded in the air on all sides, and 209401 growled as loudly as the howling of winds in the caverns of mountains.

209402
209403 3. He drew his arrows from the dark quiver, and darted them like the 209404 rays of the sun rising from the womb of night.

209405
209406 4. Each arrow flung from the bowstring, flew as thousands in the air, 209407 and fell as millions on the ground. (The arrow or bána is a name 209408 given to bombs which burst out into unnumbered shells).

209409
209410 5. The king Sindhu was equally expert in his bowmanship, as both of 209411 these bowyers owed their skill in archery to the favour of Vishnu.

209412
209413 6. Some of these darts were called bolts, which blocked the aerial 209414 passages as with bolts at their doors, and fell down on the ground with 209415 the loud roar of thunderbolts.

209416
209417 7. Others begirt with gold, flew hissing as if blown by the winds in 209418 the air, and after shining as stars in the sky, fell as blazing meteors
209419 on the ground.

209420
209421 8. Showers of shafts poured forth incessantly from the hands of 209422 Vidúratha, like the ceaseless torrents of rivers or billows of the sea, 209423 and the endless radiation of solar rays.

209424
209425 9. Shells and bullets were flying about as sparks of fire struck out
209426 of the balls of red-hot iron, and falling as flowers of forests, blown 209427 away by gusts of wind.

209428
209429 10. They fell as showers of rainwater, and as the rush of water-falls;
209430 and as plentifully as the sparks of fire which flew from the burning 209431 city of Vidúratha.

209432
209433 11. The jarring sound (chatchat) of their bowstrings, hushed the 209434 clamour of the two armies, as a calm quiets the roaring of the raging 209435 sea.

209437 12. The course of the arrows, was as the stream of Ganges (the milky 209438 path) in heaven, running towards the king Sindhu, as the river runs to 209439 meet the sea (Sindhu).

209440
209441 13. The shower of arrows flying from the golden bow of the king, was as 209442 the flood of rain falling under the variegated rainbow in the sky.

209443
209444 14. Then Lílá the native of that city, saw from the window the darts of 209445 her husband, rushing like the currents of Ganges, against the forces of 209446 Sindhu resembling a sea.

209447
209448 15. She understood the flight of those darts to promise victory to her
209449 lord, and then spoke gladly to Sarasvatí, with her lotus like face
209450 (Lit.—by opening her lotus like mouth).

209451
209452 16. Be victorious O goddess! and behold victory waiting on the side 209453 of my lord, whose darts are piercing the rocks, and breaking them to 209454 pieces.

17. As she was uttering these words full of affection (to her lord), the goddesses eyed her askance, and smiled at her womanish tenderness of heart.

18. The flaming (Agastian) fire of Sindhu swallowed the raging sea of Vidúratha's arrows, as the submarine fire consumes the water, and as Jahnu drank the stream of Ganges.

19. The missive weapons of Sindhu, thwarted the thickening arrows of his adversary, and drove them back broken and flying as dust in the empty air.

20. As an extinguished lamp loses its light in the air, so the flashes of the fire arms disappeared in the sky, and nobody knew where they fled.

21. Having thus dispelled the shower of arrows, he sent a thick cloud of his weapons, appearing as hundreds of dead bodies flying in the air.

22. Vidúratha repelled them quickly by means of his better bolts, as a hurricane disperses the frightening clouds in the air.

23. Both the kings being thus baffled in their aims by the opposing arms, which were indiscriminately let loose against one another, laid hold on more potent missiles (which they had got as gifts of their gods to them).

24. Sindhu then let fly his magic missile the gift of a Gandharva to him, which kept his hostile army all spell-bound except Vidúratha's self.

25. Struck with this weapon, the soldiers became as mute as moonstruck, staring in their looks, and appearing as dead bodies or as pictures in a painting.

26. As the soldiers of Vidúratha remained exorcised in their files, the king employed his instruments of a counter-charm to remove the spell.

27. This awakened the senses of Vidúratha's men as the morning twilight discloses the bed of lotuses, and the rising sun opens their closed petals to light; while Sindhu like the raging sun darted his rage upon them.

28. He flung his serpentine weapons upon them, which bound them as fast as a band all about their bodies, and encircled the battle ground and air, like snakes twining round the craigs and rocks.

29. The ground was filled with snakes as the lake with the spreading stalks of lotuses, and the bodies of gigantic warriors were begirt by them, like hills by huge and horrible hydras.

30. Everything was overpowered by the poignant power of the poison, and the inhabitants of the hills and forests were benumbed by the venomous infection.

31. The smart poison spread a fiery heat all around, and the frozen snows like fire-brands sent forth their burning particles which were wafted by the hot winds in the air.

32. The armigerous Vidúratha who was equally skilled in arms, had then recourse to his Garuda or serpivorous weapons, which fled like mountainous eagles to all sides.

33. Their golden pinions spread in the sky on all sides, and embroidered the air with purple gold; and the flapping of their wings wheezed like a breeze, which blew away the poisonous effluvia afar in the air.

34. It made the snakes breathe out of their nostrils with a hissing, resembling the gurgling (ghurghur) of waters in a whirlpool in the sea.

35. The flying Garuda weapons devoured the creeping terrene serpents with a whistling noise (salsala), like that of the rising waters (water-spouts), in the act of their suction by Agastya—the sun.

36. The face of the ground delivered from its covering of these reptiles, again appeared to view, as the surface of the earth re-appeared to light, after its deliverance from the waters of the deluge.

37. The army of Garudas disappeared afterwards from sight, like a line of lamps put out by the wind, and the assemblage of clouds vanishing in autumn.

38. They fled like flying mountains for fear of the bolts of the thundering Indra; and vanished like the evanescent world seen in a dream, or as an aerial castle built by fancy.

39. Then king Sindhu shot his shots of darkness (smoke), which darkened the scene like the dark cave under the ground.

40. It hid the face of the earth and sky, like the diluvian waters reaching to the welkin's face; making the army appear as a shoal of fishes, and the stars as gems shining in the deep.

41. The overspreading darkness appeared as a sea of ink or dark quagmire, or as the particles of Anjanagiri (Inky mountain) wafted by the breeze over the face of nature.

42. All beings seemed to be immersed in the sea or darkness, and to lose their energies as in the deep gloom of midnight.

43. Vidúratha the best of the most skilful in ballistics, shot his sun-bright shot which like the sun illumined the vault of the sky.

44. It rose high amidst the overspreading darkness like the sun (Agastya) with his effulgent beams, and dispelled the shades of darkness, as autumn does the rainy clouds.

45. The sky being cleared of its veil of darkness, manifested itself with its reddish clouds, resembling the blowzy bodices of damsels before the king. (Here is a pun upon the word payodhara which means both a cloud and the breast of a woman).

46. Now the landscape appeared in full view, like the understanding (good sense) of men coming in full play after the extinction of their avarice.

47. The enraged Sindhu then laid hold on his dreadful Rákshasa weapon, which he instantly flung on his foe with its bedeviled darts.

48. These horrid and destructive darts flew on all sides in the air, and roared as the roaring sea and elephantine clouds (dighastis) of heaven.

49. They were as the flames of lambent fire, with their long licking tongues and ash-coloured and smoky curls, rising as hoary hairs on the head, and making a chat-chat sound like that of moist fuel set up on fire.

50. They wheeled round in circles through the air, with a horrible tangtang noise, now flaming as fire and now fuming as smoke, and then flying about as sparks of fire.

51. With mouths beset by rows of sprouting teeth like lotus stalks, and faces defaced by dirty and fusty eyes, their hairy bodies were as stagnate pools full of moss and weeds.

209594 52. They flew about and flashed and roared aloud as some dark clouds, 209595 while the locks of hairs on their heads glared as lightnings in the 209596 midway sky.

209597
209598 53. At this instant Vidúratha the spouse of Lílá, sent forth his 209599 Náráyana weapon, having the power of suppressing wicked spirits and 209600 demons.

209601
209602 54. The appearance of this magic weapon, made the bodies of the 209603 Rákshasas, disappear as darkness at sun rise.

209604
209605 55. The whole army of these fiends was lost in the air, as the sable 209606 clouds of the rainy season, vanish into nothing at the approach of 209607 autumn.

209609 56. Then Sindhu discharged his fire arms which set fire to the sky, and 209610 began to burn down every thing, as by the all destroying conflagration
209611 of the last day.

209612
209613 57. They filled all the sides of air with clouds of smoke, which seemed 209614 to hide the face of heaven under the darkness of hell.

209615
209616 58. They set fire to the woods in the hills, which burned like 209617 mountains of gold; while the trees appeared to bloom with yellow 209618 _champaka_ flowers all around.

209619
209620 59. All the sides of the sky above, and the hills, woods and groves 209621 below, were enveloped in the flames, as if they were covered under the 209622 red powder of _huli_, with which Yama was sporting over the plain.

209623
209624 60. The heaven-spreading flame burnt down the legions in one heap of 209625 ashes, as the submarine fire consumes whole bodies of the fleet and 209626 navy in the sea.

209627
209628 61. As Sindhu continued to dart his firearms against his vanquished
209629 adversary, Vidúratha let off his watery arms with reverential regard.

209630
209631 62. These filled with water, flew forward as the shades of darkness
209632 from their hidden cells; and spread up and down and on all sides, like 209633 a melted mountain gushing in a hundred cataracts.

209634
209635 63. They stretched as mountainous clouds or as a sea in the air, and 209636 fell in showers of watery arrows and stones on the ground.

209637
209638 64. They flew up like large _tamála_ trees, and being gathered in 209639 groups like the shades of night, appeared as the thick gloom beyond the 209640 _lokáloka_ or polar mountains.

209641
209642 65. They gave the sky the appearance of subterraneous caves, emitting 209643 a gurgling sound (ghurghura) like the loud roaring of elephants.

209644
209645 66. These waters soon drank (cooled) the spreading furious fire, as the 209646 shades of the dark night swallow (efface) the surrounding red tints of 209647 the evening.

209648
209649 67. Having swallowed the fires above, the waters overflowed the ground 209650 and filled it with a humidity which served to enervate all bodies, as 209651 the power of sleep numbs every body in death-like torpidity.

209652
209653 68. In this manner both the kings were throwing their enchanted weapons
209654 against each other, and found them equally quelling and repelling one 209655 another in their course.

209656
209657 69. The heavy armed soldiers of Sindhu and the captains of his 209658 regiments were swept away by the flood, together with the warcars which 209659 floated upon it.

209660
209661 70. At this moment, Sindhu thought upon his anhydrous weapons
209662 (soshanástre—thermal arms), which possessed the miraculous power of 209663 preserving his people from the water, and hurled them in the air.

209664
209665 71. These absorbed the waters as the sun sucks up the moisture of the 209666 night, and dried up the land and revived the soldiers, except those 209667 that were already dead and gone.

209668
209669 72. Their heat chased the coldness as the rage of the illiterate 209670 enrages the learned, and made the moist ground as dry, as when the 209671 sultry winds strew the forest land with dried leaves.

209672
209673 73. It decorated the face of the ground with a golden hue, as when the 209674 royal dames adorn their persons with a yellow paint or ointment.

209675
209676 74. It put the soldiers on the opposite side to a state of feverish (or 209677 blood heated) fainting, as when the tender leaves of trees are scorched 209678 by the warmth of a wild fire in summer heat.

209679
209680 75. Vidúratha in his rage of warfare laid hold on his bow (kodanda), 209681 and having bent it to a curve, let fly his cloudy arms on his 209682 antagonist.

209683
209684 76. They sent forth columns of clouds as thick as the sable shades of 209685 night, which flying upward as a forest of dark _tamála_ trees, spread 209686 an umbrage heavy with water on high.

209687
209688 77. They lowered under the weight of their water, and stood still by 209689 their massive thickness; and roared aloud in their circles all over the 209690 sky.

209691
209692 78. Then blew the winds dropping the dewdrops of the icy store
209693 they bore on their pinions; and showers of rain fell fast from the 209694 collections of the clouds on high.

209695
209696 79. Then flashed the fiery lightnings from them like golden serpents in 209697 their serpentine course or rather like the aslant glances of the eyes
209698 of heavenly nymphs.

209699
209700 80. The roarings of the clouds rebounded in the mountainous caverns 209701 of the sky, and the quarters of heaven re-echoed to the same with the 209702 hoarse noise of elephants and the roaring of lions and growling of 209703 tigers and bears.

209704
209705 81. Showers of rain fell in floods with drops as big as _musalas_-malls
209706 or mallets, and with flashes of lightnings threatening as the stern
209707 glancings of the god of death.

209708
209709 82. Huge mists rising at first in the form of vapours of the earth, and 209710 then borne aloft by the heated air into the sky, seemed like titans 209711 to rise from the infernal regions (and then invade heaven with their 209712 gloomy armament).

209713
209714 83. The mirage of the warfare ceased after a while; as the worldly 209715 desires subside to rest upon tasting the sweet joys attending on divine
209716 knowledge.

209717
209718 84. The ground became full of mud and mire and was impassable in every 209719 part of it; and the forces of Sindhu were overflowed by the watery 209720 deluge, like the river Sinde or the sea.

209721
209722 85. He then hurled his airy weapon which filled the vault of heaven
209723 with winds, and raged in all their fury like the Bhairava-Furies on the 209724 last day of resurrection.

209725
209726 86. The winds blew on all sides of the sky, with darts falling as 209727 thunder bolts, and hailstones now piercing and then crushing all bodies
209728 as by the last blast of nature on the dooms-day.

209729
209730
209731

CHAPTER XLIX.

DESCRIPTION OF OTHER KINDS OF WEAPONS.

Then blew the icy winds of winter, blasting the beauty of the foliage of forest trees, and shaking and breaking the beautiful arbors, and covering them with gusts of dust.

2. Then rose the gale whirling the trees like birds flying in the air, dashing and smashing the soldiers on the ground, and hurling and breaking the edifices to dust.

3. This fearful squall blew away Vidúratha and his force, as a rapid current carries away the broken and rotten fragments of wood.

4. Then Vidúratha who was skilled in ballistics hurled his huge and heavy arrows, which stretched themselves to the sky, and withstood the force of the winds and rain.

5. Opposed by these rock-like barriers, the airy weapons were at a stand still, as the animal spirits are checked by the firm stoicity of the soul.

6. The trees which had been blown up by the winds and floating in the breezy air, now came down and fell upon the dead bodies, like flocks of crows upon putrid carcasses.

7. The shouting (shitkára) of the city, the distant hum (dátkára) of the village, the howling (bhánkára) of forests, and the rustling (utkára) of the trees, ceased on all sides like the vain verbiology of men.

8. Sindhu saw burning rocks (rockets?) falling from above like leaves of trees, and flying about as the winged Mainákas or moving rocks of the sea or Sinde (sindhu).

9. He then hurled his thundering weapons, falling as flaming thunderbolts from heaven, which burnt the rocks away as the flaming fire destroys the darkness.

10. These falling bolts broke the stones with their pointed ends, and hewed down the heads (tops) of the hills, like a hurricane scattering the fruits of trees on the ground.

11. Vidúratha then darted his Brahmá weapon to quell the thunderbolts, which jostling against one another, disappeared in their mutual conflict.

12. Sindhu then cast his demoniac weapons (Pisáchástras) as black as darkness, which fled as lines of horrid Pisácha demons on all sides.

13. They filled the firmament with the darkness of their bodies, and made the daylight turn to the shade of night, as if it were for fear of them.

14. They were as stalwart in their figures as huge columns of smoke, and as dark in their complexion as the blackest pitch, and tangible by the hand.

15. They were as lean skeletons with erect hairs on their heads and bearded faces, with looks as pale as those of beggars, and bodies as black as those of the aerial and nocturnal fiends.

16. They were terrific and like idiots in their looks, and moved about with bones and skulls in their hands. They were as meagre as churls, but more cruel than either the sword or thunderbolt.

209801 17. The Pisáchas lurk about the woods, bogs and highways, and pry into 209802 empty and open door houses. They hunt about as ghosts in their dark 209803 forms, and fly away as fast as the fleeting lightning.

209804
209805 18. They ran and attacked with fury the remaining forces of the enemy, 209806 that stood weaponless in the field, with their broken and sorrowful
209807 hearts.

209808
209809 19. Frightened to death they stood motionless, and dropped down their 209810 arms and armours, and stood petrified as if they were demon-struck, 209811 with staring eyes, open mouths, and unmoving hands and feet.

209812
209813 20. They let fall both their lower and upper garments, loosened their 209814 bowels and slakened their bodies through fear, and kept shaking as 209815 fixed trees by the winds.

209816
209817 21. The line of the Pisáchas then advanced to frighten Vidúratha out 209818 of his wits, but he had the good sense to understand them as the mere 209819 Mumbo-jumbos of magic.

209820
209821 22. He knew the counter charm to fight out the Pisáchas from the field, 209822 and employed his charmed weapons against the Pisácha army of his enemy.

209823
209824 23. He darted in his ire the Rúpiká weapon, which gave comfort to his 209825 own army, and deluded the Pisácha force of his adversary.

209826
209827 24. These Rúpikás flew in the air with erect hairs on their heads; 209828 their terrific eyes were sunk in their sockets, and their waists and 209829 breasts moved as trees with bunches of fruit.

209830
209831 25. They had past their youth and become old; and their bodies were 209832 bulky and worn out with age; they had deformed backs and hips, and 209833 protuberant navels and naves.

209834
209835 26. They had dark dusky bodies, and held human skulls in their hands 209836 all besmeared with blood. They had bits of half devoured flesh in their 209837 mouths, and pouring out fresh blood from their sides.

209838
209839 27. They had a variety of gestures, motions and contortions of their 209840 bodies, which were as hard as stone, with wry faces, crooked backs and 209841 twisted legs and limbs.

209842
209843 28. Some had their faces like those of dogs, crows, and owls, with 209844 broad mouths and flat cheek-bones and bellies, and held human skulls 209845 and entrails in their hands.

209846
209847 29. They laid hold of the Pisáchas as men catch little boys, and joined 209848 with them in one body as their consorts. (_i.e._ The Rúpiká witches 209849 bewitching the demoniac Pisáchas, got the better of them).

209850
209851 30. They joined together in dancing and singing with outstretched arms
209852 and mouths and eyes, now joining hand in hand and now pursuing one 209853 another in their merry sport.

209854
209855 31. They stretched their long tongues from their horrid mouths, and 209856 licked away the blood exuding from the wounds of the dead bodies.

209857
209858 32. They plunged in the pool of blood with as much delight, as if 209859 they dived in a pond of ghee, and scrabbled in the bloody puddle with 209860 outstretched arms and feet, and uplifted ears and nose.

209861
209862 33. They rolled and jostled with one another in the puddle of carrion 209863 and blood, and made it swell like the milky ocean when churned by the 209864 Mandara mountain.

209865
209866 34. As Vidúratha employed his magic weapon against the magic of Sindhu, 209867 so he had recourse to others from a sense of his inferiority.

209868
209869 35. He darted his Vetála weapon, which made the dead bodies, whether with or without their heads, to rise up in a body in their ghastly shapes.

36. The joint forces of the Vetálas, Pisáchas and Rúpikás presented a dreadful appearance as that of the Kavandhas, and seemed as they were ready to destroy the earth.

37. The other monarch was not slow to show his magical skill, by hurling his Rákshasa weapon, which threatened to grasp and devour the three worlds.

38. These with their gigantic bodies rose as high as mountains, and seemed as hellish fiends appearing from the infernal regions in their ghostly forms.

39. The ferocious body of the roaring Rákshasas, terrified both the gods and demigods (surásuras), by their loud martial music and war dance of their headless trunks (Kavandhas).

40. The giddy Vetálas, Yakshas and Kushmándas, devoured the fat and flesh of dead bodies as their toast, and drank the gory blood as their lurid wines in the coarse of their war dance.

41. The hopping and jumping of the Kushmándas, in their war dance in streams of blood, scattered its crimson particles in the air, which assembled in the form of a bridge of red evening clouds over the sparkling sea.

CHAPTER L.

DEATH OF VIDÚRATHA.

Vasishtha said:—As the tide of war was rolling violently with a general massacre on both sides, the belligerent monarchs thought on the means of saving their own forces from the impending ruin.

2. The magnanimous Sindhurāja, who was armed with patience, called to his mind the Vaishnava weapon, which was the greatest of arms and as powerful as Siva (Jove) himself.

3. No sooner was the Vaishnava weapon hurled by him with his best judgment (mantra), than it emitted a thousand sparks of fire from its flaming blade on all sides.

4. These sparks enlarged into balls, as big and bright as to shine like hundreds of suns in the sky, and others flew as the lengthy shafts of cudgels in the air.

5. Some of them filled the wide field of the firmament with thunderbolts as thick as the blades of grass, and others overspread the lake of heaven, with battle axes as a bed of lotuses.

6. These poured forth showers of pointed arrows spreading as a net-work in the sky, and darted the sable blades of swords, scattered as the leaves of trees in the air.

7. At this time, the rival king Vidúratha, sent forth another Vaishnava weapon for repelling the former, and removing the reliance of his foe in his foible.

8. It sent forth a stream of weapons counteracting those of the other, and overflowing in currents of arrows and pikes, clubs and axes and missiles of various kinds.

9. These weapons struggled with and justled against one another. They split the vault of heaven with their clattering, and cracked like loud thunder claps cleaving the mountain cliffs.

10. The arrows pierced the rods and swords, and the swords hewed down the axes and lances to pieces. The mallets and mallets drove the missiles, and the pikes broke the spears (saktis).

11. The mallets like Mandara rocks, broke and drove away the rushing arrows as waves of the sea, and the resistless swords broke to pieces by striking at the maces.

12. The lances revolved like the halo of the moon, repelling the black sword-blades as darkness, and the swift missiles flashed as the destructive fires of Yama.

13. The whirling disks were destroying all other weapons; they stunned the world by their noise, and broke the mountains by their strokes.

14. The clashing weapons were breaking one another in numbers, and Vidúratha defeated the arms of Sindhu, as the steadfast mountain defies the thunders of Indra.

15. The truncheons (Sankus) were blowing away the falchions (asis); and the spontoons (súlas) were warding off the stones of the slings. The crow bars (bhusundis) broke down the pointed heads of the pikes (bhindhípalas).

16. The iron rods of the enemy (parasúlas) were broken by tridents (trisúlas) of Siva, and the hostile arms were falling down by their crushing one another to pieces.

17. The clattering shots stopped the course of the heavenly stream, and the combustion of powder filled the air with smoke.

18. The clashing of dashing weapons lightened the sky like lightnings, their clattering cracked the worlds like thunderclaps, and their shock split and broke the mountains like thunderbolts.

19. Thus were the warring weapons breaking one another by their concussion, and protracting the engagement by their mutual overthrow.

20. As Sindhu was standing still in defiance of the prowess of his adversary, Vidúratha lifted his own fire-arm, and fired it with a thundering sound.

21. It set the war chariot of Sindhu on fire like a heap of hay on the plain, while the Vaishnava weapons filled the etherial sphere with their meteoric blaze.

22. The two Kings were thus engaged in fierce fighting with each other, the one darting his weapons like drops of raging rain, and the other hurling his arms like currents of a deluging river.

23. The two Kings were thus harassing each other like two brave champions in their contest, when the chariot of Sindhu was reduced to ashes by its flame.

24. He then fled to the woods like a lion from its cavern in the mountain, and repelled the fire that pursued him by his aqueous weapons.

25. After losing his car and alighting on the ground, he brandished his sword and cut off the hoofs and heels of the horses of his enemy's chariot in the twinkling of an eye.

26. He hacked every thing that came before him like the lean stalks of lotuses; when Vidúratha also left his chariot with his asi (ensis) in hand.

27. Both equally brave and compeers to one another in their skill in 210008 warfare, turned about in their rounds, and scraped their swords into 210009 saws by mutual strokes on one another.

210010
210011 28. With their denticulated weapons, they tore the bodies of their 210012 enemies like fishes crushed under the teeth, when Vidúratha dropt down 210013 his broken sword, and darted his javelin against his adversary.
210014
210015 29. It fell with a rattling noise on the bosom of Sindhu (the king), as 210016 a flaming meteor falls rumbling in the breast of the sea (Sindhu).
210017
210018 30. But the weapon fell back by hitting upon his breast plate, as a 210019 damsel flies back from the embrace of a lover deemed an unfit match for 210020 her.
210021
210022 31. Its shock made Sindhu throw out a flood of blood from his lungs, 210023 resembling the water spout let out from the trunk of an elephant.
210024
210025 32. Seeing this, the native Lílá cried with joy to her sister Lílá: see 210026 here the demon Sindhu killed by our lion-like husband.
210027
210028 33. Sindhu is slain by the javelin of our lion-like lord, like the 210029 wicked demon by the nails of the lion-god Nrisinha, and he is spouting 210030 forth his blood like the stream of water, thrown out by the trunk of an 210031 elephant from a pool.
210032
210033 34. But alas! this Sindhu is trying to mount on another car, although 210034 bleeding so profusely from his mouth and nostrils, as to raise a 210035 wheezing (chulchulu) sound.
210036
210037 35. Lo there! our lord Vidúratha breaking down the golden mountings
210038 of his car with the blows of his mallet, as the thundering
210039 clouds—Pushkara and Ávarta break down the gold peaks of Sumeru.
210040
210041 36. See this Sindhu now mounting on another carriage, which is now
210042 brought before him, and decorated as the splendid seat of a Gandharva.
210043
210044 37. Alack! our lord is now made the mark of Sindhu's mallet darted as 210045 a thunder bolt against him; but lo! how he flies off and avoids the 210046 deadly blow of Sindhu.
210047
210048 38. Huzza! how nimbly he has got up upon his own car; but woe is to me!
210049 that Sindhu has overtaken him in his flight.
210050
210051 39. He mounts on his car as a hunter climbs on a tree, and pierces my 210052 husband, as a bird-catcher does a parrot hidden in its hollow, with his 210053 pointed arrow.
210054
210055 40. Behold his car is broken down and its flags flung aside; his horses 210056 are hurt and the driver is driven away. His bow is broken and his 210057 armour is shattered, and his whole body is full of wounds.
210058
210059 41. His strong breast-plate is broken also by slabs of stone and his 210060 big head is pierced by pointed arrows. Behold him thrown down on earth, 210061 all mangled in blood.
210062
210063 42. Look with what difficulty he is restored to his senses, and seated 210064 in his seat with his arm cut off and bleeding under Sindhu's sword.
210065
210066 43. See him weltering in blood gushing out profusely from his body, 210067 like a rubicund stream issuing from a hill of rubies. Woe is me! and 210068 cursed be the sword of Sindhu that hath brought this misery on us.
210069
210070 44. It has severed his thighs as they dis sever a tree with a saw, and 210071 has lopped off his legs like the stalks of trees.
210072
210073 45. Ah! it is I that am so struck and wounded and killed by the enemy.
210074 I am dead and gone and burnt away with my husband's body.
210075
210076 46. Saying so, she began to shudder with fear at the woeful sight of her husband's person, and fell insensible on the ground like a creeper cut off by an axe.

47. Vidúratha though thus mutilated and disabled, was rising to smite the enemy in his rage, when he fell down from his car like an uprooted tree, and was replaced there by his charioteer ready to make his retreat.

48. At this instant, the savage Sindhu struck a sabre on his neck, and pursued the car in which the dying monarch was borne back to his tent.

49. The body of Padma (alias Vidúratha), was placed like a lotus in the presence of Sarasvatí, shining with the splendour of the sun; but the elated Sindhu was kept from entering that abode, like a giddy fly from a flame.

50. The charioteer entered in the apartment, and placed the body in its death-bed, all mangled and besmeared with blood, exuding from the pores of the severed neck, in the presence of the goddess, from where the enemy returned to his camp.

(Gloss). Here Padma fighting in the person of Vidúratha, and falling bravely in the field, obtained his redemption by his death in the presence of the goddess; but the savage Sindhu, who slew his foiled foe in his retreat, proved a ruffian in his barbarous act, and could have no admittance into the presence of the goddess and to his future salvation.

CONCLUSION.

The whole vision of Lílá, like that of Mirza, shows the state of human life, with its various incidents and phases to its last termination by death. It is not so compact and allegorical as that of the western essayist; but as idle effusions of those ideal reveries or loose vagaries which are characteristic of the wild imagination of eastern rhapsodists. The discontented Bráhmāna longs for royal dignity, imagines to himself all its enjoyments in the person of Padma, and sees at last all its evils in the character of Vidúratha; which serves as a lesson to aspirants from aiming at high worldly honours which end in their destruction.

Lílá by her wisdom sees in her silent meditation, the whole course and vicissitudes of the world, and the rise and fall of human glory in the aspirations of her husband. These parables serve to show the nature of Yoga philosophy to be no other, than an absolute idealism or mental abstraction, consisting in the abstract knowledge of all things appertaining to our temporal as well as Spiritual concerns.

The knowledge is derived either by intuition as that of the Bráhmāna and Padma, or by inspiration like that of the genius of wisdom to her votary Lílá. It may also be had by means of communication with others, as in the discourse of Rāma and his preceptor; as also from the attentive perusal of such works as the present one, treating both of temporal and spiritual subjects, and reviewing them with the eye of the mind.

The Yogi is said to know all things through the medium of his intellectual eye (jñāna chakshu), apart from his connection with every thing in the world called nihsanga, as it is expressed by the Persian sophist;—"amokhteh Oniamekhteh az harche hast_".—"Knowing and not mixing with all that is."

From this view of Yoga, it will appear that, all kinds of knowledge, whether as it existed among the ancients, or is in the course of its improvement in modern times, forms a subject of the Yoga or meditative philosophy, which embraces and comprehends in itself a knowledge of all practical arts and sciences, as the military art and other things treated of in this work. Hence it is evident, that a large fund of learning forms the greatest Yoga, and the most learned among men, were the greatest thinkers or Yogis amongst mankind in all ages. No rational being therefore can either refrain from thinking, or employing his mind to the acquisition of knowledge, both of which are termed Yoga in Indian philosophy.

But the yogi is commonly believed to be an inspired sage or seer, viewing all things appearing before him in his dream and vision. These are sometimes retrospective, and resultants of the vibrations of waking feelings and imagination, as in the case of the Bráhmaṇa's anticipation of royalty as a coming reality.

In many instances they are believed as prospective and prophetic of future events, as in Padma's dread of his future life and fate. In Lílá's case however they were "no dreams but visions strange" of supernatural sights, and prophetic of the future state of her husband, as it was revealed to her by the goddess.

But as there are few that rely any faith "in the baseless fabric of a vision", they require to be told that the books of revelation in all religions are based upon these dreams and visions, which are believed to be the outpouring of the Holy Spirit into the souls of saints, in the sacred records of all nations.

The holy scriptures furnish us with many texts on the divine origin of dreams and visions as the following.

"But this is that which was spoken by the prophet Joel. And it shall come to pass in the last days, saith God. I shall pour out of my spirit upon all flesh, and your sons and your daughters shall prophesy, and your young men shall see visions, and your old men shall dream dreams.

"And on my servants and on my handmaidens, I will pour out in those days of my spirit, and they shall prophesy;

"And I will shew wonders, in heaven above, and signs in the earth beneath; blood, and fire and vapour of smoke:

"The sun shall be turned into darkness, and the moon into blood &c."

FOOTNOTES:

[1] Cicero "_De senectute._"

[2] Kant says:—"The pure Ego is the condition of all consciousness, the condition of the sum total of experience, consequently the Ego is the source from which the universe is to be deduced." Again: "The thing _per se_ underlying all phenomena, is one and the same substance with Ego. We know not wherein the Ego is different from it. This identity of both is only an affirmation of Monism, not of Idealism." Lewis: Hist.-Phil. Vol. II. pp. 356-7. Fichte says:—"The Non-Ego is a product of the Ego. It is the Ego which thus creates the necessity for a Non-Ego and the Non-Ego wanted. Ibid. p. 358.

[3] Because the visible and destructible bodies could not proceed from the invisible and indestructible essence of God, nor the invisible and indestructible souls of persons, which are _utpanna_ or produced from the essence of the eternal and infinite spirit, can have their extinction except in their main source, when they become instinct in and identic with the supreme spirit.

[4] The _khecarí_ or aerial mode of meditation is said to confer liberation from sickness and acts and the grasp of death. Thus;

_Napídyate rogena nacha lipyate karmaná, Bádhyate sa na kalena, yo mudrá-m-vetti khecarím._

The mode of conducting it is described as follows.

_Kapála kuhare jihvá, pravesitá viparítagá, Bhruvorantargatá drishtir, mudrá-bhavati khecarí._

[5] This passage contradicts the belief of his rising and sleeping by turns at the end of each _kalpa_ of the creation and dissolution of the world, as well as the popular faith of Hari's, _sayana_ and Utthána at the opposite tropics.

[6] The pre-existent substratum is the Noumenon underlying all phenomena. It is the support of qualities, and something in which all accidents inhere. Berkeley.

[7] It contradicts the well known axiom of Locke, that, "it is impossible for the same thing to be and not be at the same time."

[8] The unknown substance is the known cause, a spiritual substance—God. Berkeley.

[9] The venerable Vasishtha would not raise question "where is the shadow of a shadow?" (_prativimbasya prativambam kutak_), had he known the discoveries of the modern science of Optics, and the achievements of photography and phonography, the refractions of prismatic lens and the vibrations of musical wires.

[10] The gods Brahma, Vishnu, Siva, Sun, Indra and all others, are assimilated into the Supreme Spirit in their state of rest. He is beyond all attribute and out of the sphere of the universe, and is of the form of an immutable Intellect.

[11] The living soul is the creative spirit of God, represented by the divine hypostasis of Hiranyagarbha or Demiurgus, which is dependent on the Supreme spirit.

[12] Tanmātra or tat-mātra might be rendered from its affinity as "that matter," but the idealistic theory of vedānta being opposed to that of the materialistic, it expresses only the idea and not the matter.

[13] The conceptualism of Europe, is a doctrine between Realism and Nominalism and betwixt Idealism and Relationism. The realist says, universal genera are real and independent existences; but the nominalist (like the Pratyaksāvādi) says that, things only exist and universals are Flatus venti-pralāpa.

[14] Note. It is the mind that lengthens time by the quick succession of its thoughts, and shortens it by its quiescence.

[15] This means the demons to have first peopled the borders and skirts of the earth. See Hesiod. Works and Days. Book I. v. 200.

[16] That the Meru or Altain chain in Scythia, was the great hive of human race is an undisputed truth in history. So Moses speaks of the giant race in Genesis chapter VI. v. 2 and 4. "And there were giants in the earth in those days, and also after that. And when the sons of God saw the daughters of men fair, they took them to wives, of all which they chose."

And again: "when the sons of God came in unto the daughters of men, and they bare children to them, the same became mighty men, which were of old, men of renown".

[17] The whole of this chapter abounds in onomatopoeian alliterations, and is more a play upon words than display of sense. It is interesting however, for these jingling words in the language, as also for the names of the warlike weapons in use among the ancients.

[18] Notwithstanding the reward of heavenly abodes promised to the slayer and slain in war, in the Sāstra and Koran, the Asiatics are far backward now-a-days, both to kill and to be killed than the Europeans, who are forbidden by the Holy writ, to slay and shed human blood. Thus there is a laxity of the injunction and prohibition on both sides.

[19] P. mujosi S. Yātudhāna, H. Jādugar = juggler.

[20] The battle ground is compared firstly with the sky, then with the sea, next with a forest, and lastly with the last dooms-day.

[21] It was easy for the lively Lílā, to learn about these peoples and their native lands in her lonely Yoga meditation, by the help of the goddess of learning; but it is hard for us to identify them without subjecting ourselves to a long labour of love, which is a sort of Yoga also, called vidya Yoga, or intense application and self devotion to learning.

[22] Note. It is not easy to say, whether this continuation and lengthy description of the warfare, is Vasishtha's or Vālmiki's own making; both of them being well acquainted with military tactics: the former having been the general of King Sudāsa against the Persians, and the latter the epic poet of Rāma's wars with Rāvana in the celebrated Ramāyana.

These descriptions are left out in the vernacular translations of this work as entirely useless in Yoga philosophy, without minding, that they formed the preliminary step to Rāma's military education, which he was soon after called to complete under the guidance of Viswāmitra in the hermitage.

[23] I have always thought the Daivāstras or superhuman arms, described in the Ramāyana and Mahābhārata epics, as a display of pyrotechnic contrivances much in use in early warfare. Or they may have been some kinds of electric, hydraulic, pneumatic and steam engines emitting gusts of fire, water, wind and smoke in the field of war. Halhead in his Gentoo Laws, tells them to be shot from a kind of cross-bow used by the Crusadiers of old.

[24] He was formerly an inhabitant of Kányá Kubjya, North Western Provinces, India. He being invited on an occasion of a ceremony (yajna) by Ádisura, Rájá of Gour Bengal, paid a visit at his court on Thursday 12th Kartick (October-November) Sakábda 994 (Tenth-Eleventh Century A.D.), and on his request he settled there and became the founder of Gour Mitra Family, at Maldah in Bengal.

UTPATTI KHANDA.

CHAPTER LI.

DESCRIPTION OF SINDHU'S DOMINIONS.

Vasishtha said:—The loud cry that the king was killed in battle by the rival monarch, struck the people with awe, and filled the realm with dismay.

2. Carts loaded with utensils and household articles, were driving through the streets; and women with their loud wailings, were running away amidst the impassable paths of the city.

3. The weeping damsels that were flying for fear, were ravished on the way by their captors; and the inhabitants were in danger of being plundered of their properties by one another.

4. The joyous shouts of the soldiers in the enemy's camp, resounded with the roarings of loose elephants and neighings of horses, trampling down the men to death on their way.

5. The doors of the royal treasury were broken open by the brave brigands, the valves flew off and the vaults re-echoed to the strokes. The warders were overpowered by numbers, and countless treasures were plundered and carried away.

6. Bandits ripped off the bellies of the royal dames in the palace, and the chandála free-booters hunted about the royal apartments.

7. The hungry rabble robbed the provisions from the royal stores; and the soldiers were snatching the jewels of the weeping children trodden down under their feet.

8. Young and beautiful maidens were dragged by their hair from the seraglio, and the rich gems that fell from the hands of the robbers, glistened all along the way.

9. The chiefs assembled with ardour with their troops of horses, elephants and war-chariots, and announced the installation of Sindhu by his minister.

10. Chief engineers were employed in making the decorations of the city and its halls, and the balconies were filled by the royal party attending at the inauguration.

11. It was then that the coronation of Sindhu's son, took place amidst the loud acclamations of victory; and titles and dignities, were conferred upon the noblemen on the victor's side.

12. The royal party were flying for life into the villages, where they were pursued by the victorious soldiers; and a general pillage spread in every town and village throughout the realm.

13. Gangs of robbers thronged about, and blocked the passages for pillage and plunder; and a thick mist darkened the light of the day for want of the magnanimous Vidúratha.

14. The loud lamentations of the friends of the dead, and the bitter cries of the dying, mixed with the clamour raised by the driving cars, elephants and horses, thickened in the air as a solid body of sound (pindagrāhya).

15. Loud trumpets proclaimed the victory of Sindhu in every city, and announced his sole sovereignty all over the earth.

16. The high-shouldered Sindhu entered the capital as a second Manu (Noah), for re-peopling it after the all-devastating flood of war was over.

17. Then the tribute of the country poured into the city of Sindhu from all sides; and these loaded on horses and elephants, resembled the rich cargoes borne by ships to the sea.

18. The new king issued forthwith his circulars and royal edicts to all sides, struck coins in his own name, and placed his ministers as commissioners in all provinces.

19. His iron-rod was felt in all districts and cities like the inexorable rod of Yama, and it overawed the living with fear of instant death.

20. All insurrections and tumults in the realm, soon subsided to rest under his reign; as the flying dust of the earth and the falling leaves of trees, fall to the ground upon subsidence of a tempest.

21. The whole country on all sides was pacified to rest, like the perturbed sea of milk after it had been churned by the Mandara mountain.

22. Then there blew the gentle breeze of Malaya, unfurling the locks of the lotus-faced damsels of Sindhu's realm, and wafting the liquid fragrance of their bodies around, and driving away the unwholesome air

(of the carnage).

CHAPTER LII.

STATE OF MAN AFTER DEATH.

Vasishtha said:—In the meanwhile, O Ráma! Lílá seeing her husband lying insensible before her and about to breathe his last, thus spoke to Sarasvatí:

2. Behold, O mother! my husband is about to shuffle his mortal coil in this perilous war, which has laid waste his whole kingdom.

3. Sarasvatí replied:—This combat that you saw to be fought with such fury, and lasting so long in the field, was neither fought in thy kingdom nor in any part of this earth.

4. It occurred nowhere except in the vacant space of the shrine, containing the dead body of the Bráhmaṇ; and where it appeared as the phantom of a dream only (in your imagination).

5. This land which appeared as the realm of thy living lord Vidúratha, was situated with all its territories in the inner apartment of Padma. (The incidents of Vidúratha's life, being but a vision appearing to the departed spirit of Padma).

6. Again it was the sepulchral tomb of the Bráhmaṇ Vasishtha, situated in the hilly village of Vindhyá, that exhibited these varying scenes of the mortal world within itself. (_i.e._ As a panorama shows many sights to the eye, and one man playing many parts in the stage).

7. As the departed soul views the vision of the past world within its narrow tomb; so is the appearance of all worldly accidents unreal in their nature. Gloss:—The apparitions appearing before the souls of the dead lying in their tombs, are as false as the appearances presenting themselves before the living souls in their tomb of this world. The souls of the living and the dead are both alike in their nature, and both susceptible of the like dreams and visions.

8. These objects that we see here as realities, including these bodies of mine and thine and this Lílá's, together with this earth and these waters, are just the same as the phantoms rising in the tomb of the deceased Bráhmaṇ of the hilly region.

9. It is the soul which presents the images of things, and nothing external which is wholly unreal can cast its reflexion on the soul. Therefore know thy soul as the true essence which is increate and immortal, and the source of all its creations within itself. Note:—The subjective is the cause of the objective and not this of that.

10. The soul reflects on its inborn images without changing itself in any state, and thus it was the nature of the Bráhmaṇ's soul, that displayed these images in itself within the sphere of his tomb.

11. But the illusion of the world with all its commotion, was viewed in the vacant space of the souls of the Bráhmaṇ and Padma, and not displayed in the empty space of their tombs, where there was no such erroneous reflexion of the world.

12. There is no error or illusion anywhere, except in the misconception of the observer; therefore the removal of the fallacy from the mind of the viewer, leads him to the perception of the light of truth.

13. Error consists in taking the unreal for the real, and in thinking the viewer and the view or the subjective and objective as different from each other. It is the removal of the distinction of the subjective and objective, that leads us to the knowledge of unity (the _on_ or one or _om_).

14. Know the Supreme soul to be free from the acts of production and destruction, and it is his light that displays all things of which He is the source; and learn the whole outer nature as having no existence nor change in itself.

15. But the souls of other beings, exhibit their own natures in themselves; as those in the sepulchral vault of the Bráhmaṇ, displayed the various dispositions to which they were accustomed. (Thus the one unvaried soul appears as many, according to its particular wont and tendency in different persons).

16. The soul has no notion of the outer world or any created thing in it; its consciousness of itself as an increate vacuity, comprehends its knowledge of the world in itself. (_i.e._ The subjective consciousness of the Ego, includes the knowledge of the objective world).

17. The knowledge of the mountain chains of Meru and others, is included under the knowledge in the vacuity of the soul; there is no substance or solidity in them as in a great city seen in a dream.

18. The soul views hundreds of mountainous ranges and thousands of solid worlds, drawn in the small compass of the mind, as in its state of dreaming.

19. Multitudes of worlds, are contained in a grain of the brain of the mind; as the long leaves of the plantain tree, are contained in one of its minute seeds.

20. All the three worlds are contained in an atom as the intellect, in the same manner as great cities are seen in a dream; and all the particles of intellect within the mind, have each the representation of a world in it.

21. Now this Lílá thy step-dame, has already gone to the world which contains the sepulchre of Padma, before the spirit of Vidúratha could join the same.

22. The moment when Lílá fell in a swoon in thy presence, know her spirit to be immediately conveyed to him and placed by his side.

23. Lílá asked:—Tell me, O goddess! how was this lady endowed here with my form before, and how is she translated to and placed as my step-dame beside my deceased husband?

24. Tell me in short, in what form she is now viewed by the people in Padma's house, and the manner in which they are talking to her at present.

25. The goddess replied:—Hear Lílá, what I will relate to thee in brief in answer to thy question, regarding the life and death of this Lílá as an image of thyself.

26. It is thy husband Padma, that beholds these illusions of the world spread before him in the same sepulchre in the person of Vidúratha.

27. He fought this battle as thou didst see in his reverie, and this Lílá resembling thyself was likewise a delusion. These his men and enemies were but illusions, and his ultimate death, was as illusory as a phantom of the imagination, like all other things in this world.

28. It was his self delusion, that showed him this Lílá as his wife, and it is the same deceit of a dream, which deludes thee to believe thyself as his consort.

29. As it is a mere dream that makes you both to think yourselves as his wives, so he deems himself as your husband, and so do I rely on my existence (also in a like state of dream).

30. The world with all its beauty, is said to be the spectre of a vision; wherefore knowing it a mere visionary scene, we must refrain from relying any faith in this visible phantasmagoria.

31. Thus this Lílá, yourself and this king Vidúratha, are but phantoms of your fancy: and so am I also, unless I believe to exist in the self-existent spirit.

32. The belief of the existence of this king and his people, and of ourselves as united in this place, proceeds from the fulness of that intellect, which fills the whole plenitude.

33. So this queen Lílá also situated in this place with her youthful beauty, and smiling so charmingly with her blooming face, is but an image of divine beauty.

34. See how gentle and graceful are her manners, and how very sweet is her speech; her voice is as dulcet as the notes of the Kokila, and her motions as slow as those of a lovelorn maiden.

35. Behold her eyelids like the leaves of the blue lotus, and her swollen breasts rounded as a pair of snow-balls; her form is as bright as liquid gold, and her lips as red as a brace of ripe Vimba fruits.

36. This is but a form of thee as thou didst desire to be to please thy husband, and it is the very figure of thy ownself, that thou now beholdest with wonder.

37. After the death of thy husband, his soul caught the same reflexion of thy image, as thou didst desire to be hereafter; and which thou now seest in the person of the young Lílá before thee.

38. Whenever the mind has a notion or sensation or fancy of some material object, the abstract idea of its image is surely imprinted in the intellect.

39. As the mind comes to perceive the unreality of material objects, it thenceforth begins to entertain the ideas of their abstract entities within itself. (Hence the abstract ideas of things are said to accompany the intellectual spirit after its separation from the body).

40. It was the thought of his sure death, and the erroneous conception of the transmigration of his soul in the body of Vidúratha, that represented to Padma thy desired form of the youthful Lílá, which was the idol of his soul. (This passage confutes the doctrine of metempsychosis, and maintains the verity of eternal ideas).

41. It was thus that thou wast seen by him and he was beheld by thee according to your desires; and thus both of you though possess of the same unvaried soul which pervades all space, are made to behold one another in your own ways (agreeably to your desires).

42. As the spirit of Brahma is all pervasive, and manifests itself in various ways in all places; it is beheld in different lights, according to the varying fancies (vikshepa sakti); or tendencies (vásaná sakti) of men, like the ever-changeful scenes appearing to us in our visions and dreams.

43. The omnipotent spirit displays its various powers in all places, and these powers exert themselves everywhere, according to the strong force and capability it has infused in them (in their material or immaterial forms).

44. When this pair remained in their state of death-like insensibility, they beheld all these phantoms in their inner souls, by virtue of their reminiscence and desires (which are inherent in the soul).

210974
 210975 45. That such and such person were their fathers and such their mothers
 210976 before, that they lived in such places, had such properties of theirs, 210977 and did such acts erewhile (are reminiscences of the soul).
 210978
 210979 46. That they were joined together in marriage, and the multitude which 210980 they saw in their minds, appeared to them as realities for the time in 210981 their imagination (as it was in a magic show).
 210982
 210983 47. This is an instance that shows our sensible perceptions, to be no
 210984 better than our dreams; and it was in this deluded state of Lílá's mind,
 210985 that I was worshipped and prayed by her:—
 210986
 210987 48. In order to confer upon her the boon that she might not become a 210988 widow; and it was by virtue of this blessing of mine, that this girl had 210989 died before her husband's death (to escape the curse of widowhood).
 210990
 210991 49. I am the progeny of Brahmá, and the totality of that intelligence of 210992 which all beings participate: it is for this reason that I was adored by 210993 her as the _Kula Devi_ or tutelar divinity of all living beings.
 210994
 210995 50. It was at last that her soul left her body, and fled with her mind 210996 in the form of her vital breath, through the orifice of her mouth.
 210997
 210998 51. Then after the insensibility attendant upon her death was over, she 210999 understood in her intellect her living soul to be placed in the same 211000 empty space with the departed spirit of Padma.
 211001
 211002 52. Her reminiscence pictured her in her youthful form, and she beheld 211003 herself as in a dream, to be situated in the same tomb. She was as a 211004 blooming lotus with her beautiful countenance, and her face was as 211005 bright as the orb of the moon; her eyes were as large as those of an 211006 antelope, and she was attended by her graceful blandishments for the 211007 gratification of her husband.

211012 CHAPTER LIII.

211013 REPRESENTATIONS OF REMINISCENCE.

211014
 211015
 211016
 211017 Argument. Description of Lílá's passage in the air, and her union with 211018 her husband's spirit. Relation of the depravity of those that are 211019 unacquainted with and unpractised in Yoga.
 211020
 211021

211022 Vasishtha said:—Lílá having obtained the blessing of the goddess, 211023 proceeded with her fancied body to meet her royal spouse in heaven
 211024 beyond the skies.
 211025

211026 2. Having assumed her spiritual form which was as light as air, she fled 211027 merrily as a bird; and was wafted aloft by the fond desire of joining 211028 with her beloved lord.
 211029

211030 3. She met before her a damsel sent by the goddess of wisdom, and as 211031 issuing out of the best model of her heart's desire.
 211032

211033 4. The damsel said:—I am the daughter of thy friend Sarasvatí, and 211034 welcome thee, O beauteous lady in this place. I have been waiting here 211035 on thy way through the sky in expectation of thee.
 211036

211037 5. Lílá said:—Lead me, O lotus-eyed maid to the side of my husband, as 211038 the visit of the good and great never goes for nothing.
 211039

211040 6. Vasishtha said:—The damsel replied, come let us go there; and so 211041 saying, she stood before her looking forward on her way.
 211042

7. Then proceeding onward both together, they came to the door-way of heaven, which was as broad as the open palm of the hand, and marked with lines as those in palmistry. (?).

8. They passed the region of the clouds, and overstepped the tracks of the winds; then passing beyond the orbit of the sun, they reached the stations of the constellations.

9. Thence they passed through the regions of air and water (Indraloka), to the abodes of the gods and saints (Siddhas); whence they went across the seats of Brahmá, Vishnu and Siva to the great belt-of the universe.

10. Their spiritual bodies pierced through its orifice, as the humidity of ice water passes out of the pores of a tight water-jar.

11. The body of Lílá was of the form of her mind, which was of the nature of its own bent and tenor, and conceived these wanderings within itself (_i.e._, the peregrinations of Lílá were purely the workings of her own mind and inclination).

12. Having traversed the spheres of Brahmá, Vishnu and Siva, and crossed the limit of the mundane sphere, and the environs of atmospheric water and air:—

13. They found an empty space as spacious as the scope of the great intellect, and impassable by the swift Garuda (the eagle of Jupiter) even in millions of Kalpa ages. (_i.e._ The unlimited space of the mind and vacuity).

14. There they beheld an infinity of shapeless and nameless worlds, scattered about as the countless fruits in a great forest. (The Nebulae of unformed worlds).

15. They pierced through the ambit of one of these orbs before them, and passed inside the same as a worm creeps in a fruit which it has perforated.

16. This brought them back by the same spheres of Brahmá, Indra and others, to the orb of the globe below the starry frame.

17. Here they saw the same country, the same city and the same tomb as before; and after entering the same, they sat themselves beside the corpse of Padma covered under the heap of flowers.

18. At this time Lílá lost the sight of the heavenly damsel, who had been her companion erewhile, and who had now disappeared from her sight like a phantom of her illusion.

19. She then looked at the face of her husband, lying there as a dead body in his bed; and recognized him as such by her right discretion.

20. This must be my husband, said she, ay my very husband, who fell fighting with Sindhu, and has now attained this seat of the departed heroes, where he rests in peace.

21. I have by the grace of the goddess arrived here in person, and reckon myself truly blest to find my husband also as such (_i.e._, resting here in his own figure).

22. She then took up a beautiful _chauri_ flapper in her hand, and began to wave it over his body as the moon moves in the sky over the earth.

23. The waking Lílá asked:—Tell me, O goddess! in what manner did the king and his servants and hand-maids accost this lady, and what they thought her to be.

24. The goddess replied:—It was by our gift of wisdom to them, that this lady, that king and those servants, found themselves to partake of the one and same intellectual soul, in which they all subsisted.

25. Every soul is a reflection of the divine intellect, and is destined by his fixed decree to represent the individual souls to one another as refractions of the same, or as shadows in a magic show (bhojakádrishta).

26. Thus the king received his wife as his companion and queen, and his servants as cognate with himself. (_i.e._ Partaking of the same soul with his own).

27. He beheld the unity of his soul with her's and their's, and no distinction subsisting between any one of them. He was astonished to find that there was nothing distinct in them from what he had in himself.

28. The waking Lílá said:—Why did not that Lílá meet her husband in her own person, according to her request and the boon that was granted to her?

29. The goddess replied:—It is not possible for unenlightened souls (as that of the young Lílá), to approach in person to holy spirits (or their persons or places), which are visible and accessible only to the meritorious, and unapproachable by gross bodies as the sun light is inaccessible by a shadow.

30. So it is the established law from the beginning of creation, that intelligent souls can never join with dull beings and gross matter, as truth can never be mixed up with falsehood.

31. And so is that as long as a boy is prepossessed with his notion of a ghost, it is in vain to convince him of the falsehood of goblins as mere chimeras of his imagination.

32. And as long as the feverish heat of ignorance rages within the soul, it is impossible for the coolness of the moon of intelligence to spread over it.

33. So long also as one believes himself to be composed of a corporeal body, and incapable to mount in the higher atmosphere, it is no way possible to make him believe otherwise (that he has an incorporeal nature in his soul and mind).

34. But it is by virtue of one's knowledge and discrimination, and by his own merit and divine blessing, that he acquires a saintly form (nature); wherewith he ascends to the higher region, as you have done with this body of yours.

35. As dry leaves of trees are burnt in no time by the burning fire, so this corporeal body is quickly lost by one's assumption of his spiritual frame.

36. The effect of a blessing or curse, on any one is no other than his obtaining the state he desired or feared to have. (Hence the boon of Lílá has secured to her what she wished to get).

37. As the false appearance of a snake in a rope, is attended with no motion or action of the serpent in it; so the unreal views of Lílá's husband and others, were but the motionless imageries of her own imagination.

38. Whoever views the false apparitions of the dead as present before the vision of his mind, he must know them as reflections of his past and constant remembrance of them.

39. So our notions of all these worlds are mere products of our reminiscence, and no creation of Brahmá or any other cause; but simple productions of our desire (which presents these figures to the imagination).

40. So they who are ignorant of the knowable spirit of God, have only the notions of the outer world in them; as they view the distant orb of the moon within themselves (in their minds).

CHAPTER LIV.

REFLECTIONS ON DEATH.

Argument. The lot of living beings and the cause of their death. The duration of human life as determined by their acts and enjoyments, and the merit of their conduct in life time.

The goddess continued:—Those therefore who know the knowable God, and rely in virtue, can go to the spiritual worlds and not others. (Knowable means what ought to be and not what is or can be known).

2. All material bodies which are but false and erroneous conceptions of the mind, can have no place in Truth (the true spirit); as no shadow can have any room in sunshine. (So gross matter has no room in the subtile spirit).

3. Lílá being ignorant of the knowable (God), and unacquainted with the highest virtue (the practice of Yoga), could go no further than the city of her lord which she had at heart.

4. The waking Lílá said:—Let her be where she is (I inquire no more about her); but will ask you of other things. You see here my husband is about to die, so tell me what must I do at present.

5. Tell me the law of the being and not being of beings, and what is that destiny which destines the living beings to death.

6. What is it that determined the natures of things and gave existence to the categories of objects? What is it that has caused the warmth of the fire and sun, and gave stability to the earth?

7. Why is coldness confined to the frost and the like, and what forms the essence of time and space; what are the causes of the different states of things and their various changes, and the causes of the solidity of some and tenuity of others?

8. What is that which causes the tallness of trees and men above the grass and brambles; and why is it that many things dwindle and decay in the course and capability of growth?

9. The goddess said:—At the universal dissolution of the world, when all things are dissolved in the formless void; there remains the only essence of Brahma, in the form of the infinite sky stretching beyond the limits of creation on all sides.

10. It then reflects in its intellect in the form of a spark of fire, as you are conscious of your aerial journey in a dream.

11. This atomic spark then increased in its size in the divine spirit, and having no substance of itself, appeared what is commonly styled the ideal world.

12. The spirit of God residing in it, thought itself as Brahmá—the soul of the world, who reigned over it in his form of the mind, as if it was identic with the real world itself. (The world is a display of the Divine Mind).

13. The primary laws that he has appointed to all things at their first creation, the same continue invariably in force with them to the present time. (_i.e._ The primordial law or nature).

211251 14. The minds of all turn in the same way as it was willed by the divine 211252 mind, and there is nothing which of itself can go beyond the law which 211253 the divine will has assigned to it.
211254

211255 15. It is improper to say that all formal existences are nothing, 211256 because they remain in their substance (of the divine spirit), after 211257 disappearance of their forms; as the substance of gold remains the same 211258 after alteration of its shape and form.
211259

211260 16. The elementary bodies of fire and frost still continue in the same 211261 state, as their elements were first formed in the Divine mind in the 211262 beginning of creation.
211263

211264 17. Nothing therefore has the power to forsake its own nature, as long 211265 as the divine intellect continues to direct his eternal laws and decrees 211266 which are appointed to all.
211267

211268 18. It is impossible for any thing to alter its nature now from the 211269 eternal stamp, which Divine will has set upon all the substantial and 211270 ideal forms of creation.
211271

211272 19. As the Divine Intellect knows no opposition in its way, it never 211273 turns from the tenor of its own wonted intelligence which directs the 211274 destinies of all. (This is the real or subjective, intellectual or 211275 nominal view of evolution of all things from the divine mind).
211276

211277 20. But know in the first place the world to be no created thing. All 211278 this that appears to exist, is but a display of the notions in our 211279 consciousness, like the appearances in our dreams.
211280

211281 21. The unreal appears as real, as the shadow seems to be the substance.
211282 Our notions of things are the properties of our nature. (_i.e._ They are 211283 natural to us, as they are engrafted in it by the eternal mind).
211284

211285 22. The manner in which the intellect exhibited itself, in its different 211286 manifestations, at the beginning, the same continues in its course to 211287 this time, and is known as the _samvid-kachana_ or manifestations of 211288 consciousness, which constitute the _niyati_-course or system of the 211289 universe.
211290

211291 23. The sky is the manifestation of the intellectual idea of vacuity in 211292 the divine mind; and the idea of duration in the intellect, appeared in 211293 the form of the parts of time.
211294

211295 24. The idea of liquidity evolved itself in the form of water in the 211296 divine mind; in the same manner as one dreams of water and seas in his 211297 own mind. (So the air and earth are manifestations of the ideas of 211298 fluidity and solidity).
211299

211300 25. We are conscious of our dreams in some particular state of our 211301 intellect, and it is the wonderfully cunning nature of the intellect, 211302 that makes us think the unreal as real.
211303

211304 26. The ideas of the reality of earth, air, fire and water are all 211305 false; and the intellect perceives them within itself, as its false 211306 dreams and desires and reveries.
211307

211308 27. Now hear me tell you about death, for removing your doubts with 211309 regard to the future state; that death is destined for our good, in as 211310 much as it leads us to the enjoyment of the fruits of acts in this life.
211311

211312 28. Our lives are destined in the beginning to extend to one, two, three 211313 and four centuries in the different Kali, Dwápara, Tretá and Satya ages
211314 of the world. (Corresponding with the golden, silver, brazen and iron 211315 ages of the ancients).
211316

211317 29. It is however by virtue of place and time, of climate and food, and 211318 our good or bad actions and habits, that human life extends above or descends below these limits.

30. Falling short of one's duties lessens his life, as his excelling in them lengthens its duration; but the mediocrity of his conduct keeps it within its proper bound.

31. Boys die by acts causing infant diseases and untimely deaths; so do the young and old die of acts that bring on juvenile and senile weakness, sickness and ultimate death.

32. He who goes on doing his duties as prescribed by law of the Sástras, becomes both prosperous and partaker of the long life allotted by the rule of the Sástra.

33. So likewise do men meet their last state and future reward, according to the nature of their acts in life-time; or else their old age is subjected to regret and remorse, and all kinds of bodily and mental maladies and anxieties.

34. Lílá said:—Tell me in short, O moon-faced goddess! something more with regard to death; as to whether it is a pleasure or pain to die, and what becomes of us after we are dead and gone from here. (Death is said to be release from misery by some, and the most grievous of all torments by others. So Pope:—O, the pain, the bliss of dying).

35. The goddess replied:—Dying men are of three kinds, and have different ends upon their death. These are those who are ignorant, and such as are practiced in yoga, and those that are reasonable and religious.

36. Those practicing the dháraná yoga, may go wherever they like after leaving their bodies, and so the reasonable yogi is at liberty to range everywhere. (It consists in mental retention and bodily patience and endurance).

37. He who has not practiced the dháraná yoga, nor applied himself to reasoning, nor has certain hopes of the future, is called the ignorant sot, and meets with the pain and pangs of death.

38. He whose mind is unsubdued, and full of desires and temporal cares and anxieties, becomes as distressed as a lotus torn from its stalk. (i.e. It is the subjection of inordinary passions, and suppression of inordinate desires and cares, which ensure our true felicity).

39. The mind that is not guided by the precepts of the Sástras, nor purified by holiness; but is addicted to the society of the wicked, is subjected to the burning sensation of fire within itself at the moment of death.

40. At the moment when the last gurgling of the throat chokes the breath, the eye-sight is dimmed and the countenance fades away; then the rational soul also becomes hazy in its intellect.

41. A deep darkness spreads over the dimming sight, and the stars twinkle before it in day-light; the firmament appears to be obscured by clouds, and the sky presents its gloomy aspect on every side.

42. An acute pain seizes the whole frame, and a fata Morgana dances before the vision; the earth is turned to air and the mid-air seems to be the moving place of the dying person.

43. The sphere of heaven revolves before him, and the tide of the sea seems to bear him away. He is now lifted up in the air, and now hurled down as in his state of dizziness or dream.

44. Now he thinks as falling in a dark pit, and then as lying in the cavern of a hill; he wants to tell aloud his torments, but his speech fails him to give utterance to his thoughts.

45. He now finds himself as falling down from the sky, and now as whirled in the air like a bundle of straws blown aloft in the air by a gust of wind. He is now riding swiftly as in a car, and now finds himself melting as snow.

46. He desires to acquaint his friends of the evils of life and this world; but he is carried away from them as rapidly as by an air-engine, (like a stone shot by a ballista or an aeronaut in a balloon).

47. He whirls about as by a rotatory machine or turning wheel, and is dragged along like a beast by its halter. He wallows about as in an eddy, or turns around as the machine of some engine.

48. He is borne in the air as a straw, and is carried about as a cloud by the winds. He rises high like a vapour, and then falls down like a heavy watery cloud pouring out in the sea.

49. He passes through the endless space and revolves in all its vortiginous vacuities, to find as it were, a place free from the vicissitudes to which the earth and ocean are subject. (_i.e._ A place of peace and rest).

50. Thus the rising and falling spirit roves without cessation, and the soul breathing hard and sighing without intermission, sets the whole body in sore pain and agony.

51. By degrees the objects of his senses become as faint to his failing organs, as the landscape fades to view at the setting of the sun. (The world recedes; it disappears: Pope).

52. He loses the remembrance of the past and present, upon the failing of his memory at this moment; as one is at a loss to know the sides of the compass after the evening twilight has passed away.

53. In his fit of fainting, his mind loses its power of thinking; and he is lost in a state of ignorance, at the loss of all his thoughts and sensibility. (So the lines:—It absorbs me quite, steals my senses, shuts my sight. Pope).

54. In the state of faintishness, the vital breath ceases to circulate through the body; and at the utter stoppage of its circulation, there ensues a collapse _murch'ha_ or swooning.

55. When this state of apoplexy joined with delirium, has reached its climax, the body becomes as stiff as stone by the law of inertia, ordained for living beings from the beginning.

56. Lílá said:—But tell me, O goddess, why do these pains and agonies, this fainting and delirium, and disease and insensibility, overtake the body, when it is possessed of all its eight organs entire?

57. The goddess replied:—It is the law appointed by the author of life from the first, that such and such pains are to fall to the lot of living beings at such and such times. (Man's primeval sin brought pain and disease and death into the world).

58. The primeval sin springs of itself as a plant in the conscious heart of man, and subjects him to his doomed miseries, which have no other intelligible cause. (There is no other assignable cause of death and disease except the original guilt).

59. When the disease and its pain overpower the body, and prevent the lungs and arteries to expand and contract, in order to inhale and exhale the air, it loses its equipoise (samána) and becomes restless.

60. When the inhaled air does not come out, nor the exhaled breath re-enter the lungs, all pulsation is at a stop; and the organic sensations are lost in their remembrance only. (As in the memory of sleeping and dreaming men).

61. When there is no ingress nor egress of the vital air, the pulse sinks and becomes motionless, and the body is said to become senseless, and the life to be extinct.

62. I shall also die away in my destined time, but my consciousness of former knowledge will all be awake at the hour of death (which proves the immortality of the soul).

63. Though I am dead and gone from here in this manner, yet I must mind, that the seed of my innate consciousness (the soul), is never destroyed with my life and body.

64. Consciousness is inward knowledge and imperishable in its nature; therefore the nature of consciousness is free from birth and death. (The body is subject to birth and death, but not the soul).

65. This consciousness is as clear as a fresh fountain in some persons, and as foul as tide water in others; it is bright in its form of the pure intellect—chit—in some, and polluted with the passions of animal life, in its nature of the sentient or living soul—chetana—in many.

66. As a blade of grass is composed of joints in the midst, so is the even nature of the sentient or living soul; which is combined with the two states of birth and death amidst it.

67. The sentient soul is neither born nor dead at any time; but witnesses these two states as the passing shadows and apparitions in a dream and vision.

68. The soul is no other than the intellect, which is never destroyed anywhere by any. Say, what other thing is this soul, which is called the Purusha beside the intellect itself. Gloss. It is not the body, nor the vital breath, nor perceptions nor mind; it is not the understanding nor egoism, nor the heart nor illusion, all of which are inactive of themselves.

69. Say then whom and what you call to be dead today, and whether the intellect is liable to disease or demise at any time and in any wise. Millions of living bodies are verily dying every day, but the intellect ever remains imperishable.

70. The intellect never dies at the death of any living being; because all the living soul continues the same upon the demise of every body here.

71. The living soul therefore, is no more than the principle which is conscious of its various desires, affections and passions. It is not that principle to which the phases of life and death are attributed by men.

72. So there is none that dies, nor any one that is born at any time; it is this living principle only that continually revolves in the deep eddy of its desires.

73. Considering the unreality of the visible phenomena, there can be no desire for them in any body; but the inward soul that is led by its egoism to believe them as true, is subject to death at the dis-appearance of the phenomena.

74. The recluse ascetic flying from the fears of the world as foreign to his soul; and having none of its false desires rising in his breast, becomes liberated in his life and assimilated with the true ONE.

- Lílá said:—Tell me, goddess! for edification of my knowledge, the manner in which a living being comes to die and to be re-born in another form.
2. The goddess replied:—As the action of the heart ceases to act, and the lungs blow and breathe no more, the current of the vital airs is utterly stopped, and the living being loses its sensibility.
3. But the intellectual soul which has no rise nor fall, remains ever the same as it abides in all moving and unmoving bodies, and in air, water, fire and vacuum. Gloss. So saith the Sruti:—The soul is unlimited, permanent and imperishable.
4. When the hindrance of breathing, stops the pulsation, and motion of the body, it is said to be dead; and is then called an inert corpse (but not so the soul).
5. The body being a dead carcase, and the breathing mixing with the air, the soul is freed from the bonds of its desires, and flies to and remains in the mode of the discrete and self-existent soul. Gloss. The Sruti says:—"His elemental parts mix with the elements, and his soul with the Supreme." The unconditioned—nirupadhika—spirit, joins with the Holy spirit; but not so the conditioned (upádhika) soul of the unholy.
6. The soul having its desires and styled the animal spirit—Jíva, is otherwise than the átman—soul. It remains in its sepulchral vault under the same atmosphere as the soul of Padma, which thou sawst hovering about his tomb. Gloss. The desire binds down the spirit to its own sphere. (The Ghost hovering about the charnel vault. Milton).
7. Hence such departed spirits are called pretas or ghosts of the dead, which have their desires and earthly propensities attached to them; as the fragrance of the flower is concentrated in its pollen, and thence diffused through the air.
8. As the animal souls are removed to other spheres, after their departure from this visible world, they view the very many scenes and sights; that their desires present before them like visions in a dream.
9. The soul continues to remember all its past adventures, even in its next state, and finds itself in a new body, soon after the insensibility of death is over. Gloss. This is the linga or súkshma deha—the spiritual or subtile body of spiritualism.
10. What appears an empty vacuum to others, seems as a dusky cloud to the departed soul, enveloping the earth, sky, moon and all other orbs within its bosom (the circumambient atmosphere).
11. The departed spirits are classed in six orders, as you shall now hear from me; namely, the great, greater and greatest sinners, and so likewise the three degrees of the virtuous.
12. These are again subdivided into three kinds, as some belonging to one state, and others composed of two or three states; (i.e. of virtue and vice intermixed) in the same individual soul.
13. Some of the most sinful souls, lose the remembrance of their past states for the period of a whole year; and remain quite insensible within themselves, like blocks of wood or stone. (This is called the pretarásthá continuing for a whole year after death). (It is allied to Abraham's bosom or Irack of Mahomedans).
14. Rising after this time, they are doomed to suffer the endless torments of hell; which the hardness of their earthly mindedness has brought upon them. (This is the Purgatory of Christians).

15. They then pass into hundreds of births, leading from misery to misery, or have a moment's respite from the pains in their short lived prosperity, amidst their dreaming journey through life. (These transmigrations of the soul, are the consequences of its evil propensities).
16. There are others, that after their torpor of death is over, come to suffer the unutterable torments of torpidity, in the state of unmoving trees (which are fixed to undergo all the inclemencies of weather).
17. And others again that having undergone the torments of hell, according to their inordinate desires in life, are brought to be re-born on earth, in a variety of births in different forms.
18. Those of lesser crimes, are made to feel the inertness of stones for sometime, after the insensibility attending upon their death. (This means either the insensibility of dead bodies, or that of mineral substances.)
19. These being awakened to sensibility after some period, either of duration long or short (according to their desert); are made to return on earth, to feel the evils of brutish and beastly lives.
20. But the souls of the least sinful, come to assume soon after their death, some perfect human form, in order to enjoy the fruits of their desire and desert on earth.
21. These desires appear before the soul as dreams, and awaken its reminiscence of the past, as present at that moment.
22. Again the best and most virtuous souls, come soon after their death, to find themselves in heavenly abodes, by reason of their continued thoughts and speculations of them.
23. Some amongst them, are brought to enjoy the rewards of their actions in other spheres, from which they are sent back to the mortal world, at the residences of the auspicious and best part of mankind.
24. Those of moderate virtues are blown away by the atmospheric air, upon the tops of trees and medicinal plants, where they rove about as the protozoa, after the insensibility of death is over.
25. Being nourished here by the juice of fruits, they descend in the form of serum and enter into the hearts of men, whence they fall into the uterus in the form of semen virilis, which is the cause of the body and life of other living beings.
- The gloss says:—Having enjoyed in the next world the good fruits of their virtuous deeds, they are blown down on earth by the winds and rain. Here they enter in the form of sap and marrow in the vegetable productions of corn, grain and fruits; and these entering the body of animals in the form of food, produce the semen, which becomes the cause of the lives and bodies of all living beings.
26. Thus the dead, figure to themselves some one of these states of living bodies, according to their respective proclivity, after they recover from the collapse attending upon their death.
27. Having thought themselves to be extinct at first, they come to feel their resuscitation afterwards, upon receiving the offering of the mess, made to their departed spirits (by their surviving heirs).
28. Then they fancy they see the messengers of death, with nooses in their hands, come to fetch them to the realm of Yama; where they depart with them, (with their provision for one year offered in their Srádh ceremony).
29. There the righteous are carried in heavenly cars to the gardens of Paradise, which they gain by their meritorious acts in life.

30. But the sinful soul, meets with icebergs and pitfalls, tangled with thorns and iron pikes, and bushes and brambles in its passage, as the punishment of its sins.

31. Those of the middling class, have a clear and paved passage, with soft grassy path-ways shaded by cooling arbours, and supplied with spring waters on both sides of them.

32. On its arrival there, the soul reflects within itself that: "here am I, and yonder is Yama—the lord of the dead. The other is the judge of our actions—Chitragupta, and this is his judgment given on my behalf".

33. In this manner the great world also, appears to every one as in a dream; and so the nature and manner of all things, present themselves before every soul.

34. But all these appearances are as void as air; the soul alone is the sentient principle, and the spacious space and time, and the modes and motions of things, though they appear as real, are nothing in reality.

35. Here (in Yama's court), the soul is pronounced to reap the reward of its acts, whereby it ascends either to the blissful heaven above, or descends to the painful hell below.

36. After having enjoyed the bliss of heaven, or suffered the torment of hell, it is doomed to wander in this earth again, to reap the reward of its acts in repeated transmigrations.

37. The soul springs up as a paddy plant, and brings forth the grains of intelligence; and then being assembled by the senses, it becomes an animal, and lastly an intelligent being.

i.e. The insensible vegetable, entering into the animal body in the form of food, is converted to a sensible but irrational soul; but entering as food in the body of man, it turns to a rational and human soul. The one Universal soul is thus diversified in different beings. (It is the plant and food that sustains and nourishes all souls. Gloss).

38. The soul contains in itself the germs of all its senses, which lie dormant in it for want of its bodily organs. It is contained in the semen virilis of man, which passing into the uterus, produces the fœtus in the womb of the female.

39. The fœtus then becomes either well-formed or deformed, according to the good or evil deeds of the person in its past state; and brings forth the infant of a goodly or ill shapen appearance.

40. It then perceives the moonlike beauty of youthful bloom, and its amorous disposition coming upon itself; and feels afterwards the effects of hoary old age, defacing its lotus-like face, as the sleets of snow, shatter and shrivel the lotus leaflets.

41. At last it undergoes the pains of disease and death, and feels the same insensibility of Euthanasia as before, and finds again as in a dream its taking of a new form.

42. It again believes itself to be carried to the region of Pluto, and subjected to the former kinds of revolution; and thus it continues to conceive its transmigration, in endless births and various forms.

43. Thus the aerial spirit goes on thinking, for ever in its own ethereal sphere, all its ceaseless metempsychosis, until its final liberation from this changeful state.

44. Lílá said:—Tell me kindly, O good goddess! for the enlightenment of my understanding, how this misconception of its changeableness, first came upon the soul in the beginning.

211733
211734 45. The goddess replied:—It is the gross view of the abstract, that 211735 causes us to assume the discrete spirit, in the concrete forms of the 211736 earth and sky and rocks and trees (all of which subsist in the spirit, 211737 and are unsubstantial in themselves).
211738
211739 46. As the divine intellect manifests itself, as the soul and model of 211740 all forms; so we see these manifestations, in the transcendental sphere
211741 of its pure intelligence.
211742
211743 47. In the beginning, God conceived himself as the lord of creation
211744 (Brahmá); and then as it were in a dream, he saw in himself, all the 211745 forms as they continue to this time.
211746
211747 48. These forms were manifested in the divine spirit, at first as his 211748 will; and then exhibited in the phenomenal world, as reflexions of the 211749 same, in all their present forms.
211750
211751 49. Among these some are called living beings, which have the motions of 211752 their bodies and limbs; and live by means of the air which they breathe, 211753 and which circulate in their bodies through the lungs and arteries.
211754
211755 50. Such also is the state of the vegetable creation from the first,
211756 that they having their inward sensitiveness, are notwithstanding devoid 211757 of outward motion, and receive their sustenance by the roots; wherefore
211758 they are called Pádapas or pedobibers.
211759
211760 51. The hollow sphere of the divine intellect, beaming with 211761 intelligence, sends forth its particles of percipience, which form the 211762 consciousness of some beings, and sensitiveness in others.
211763
211764 52. But man uses his eyes to view the outer and the reflected world (in 211765 disregard of his consciousness of the real); although the eyes do not 211766 form his living soul, nor did they exist at his creation and before his 211767 birth. (When his view was concentrated within himself as in his sleeping 211768 visions).
211769
211770 53. It is according to one's estimation of himself, that he has his 211771 proper and peculiar desires, and the particular form of his body also.
211772 Such is the case of the elementary bodies likewise, from their inward
211773 conception of their peculiar natures.
211774
211775 Gloss:—So the ideas of vacuity, fluidity and solidity forming the bodies 211776 of air, water and earth; and the form of every thing agreeing with its 211777 inherent nature.
211778
211779 54. Thus all moving and unmoving things, have their movable and 211780 immovable bodies, according to their intrinsic disposition or 211781 idiosyncrasy as such and such.
211782
211783 55. Hence all self-moving beings have their movable bodies, conforming 211784 with the conception of their natures as so and so; and in this state of 211785 their belief, they continue to this time, with their same inborn or 211786 congenital bodies.
211787
211788 56. The vegetable world still continues in the same state of fixedness, 211789 from its sense of immobility; and so the rocks and minerals continue in 211790 their inert state, from the inborn sense of their inertness.
211791
211792 57. There is no distinction whatever between inertness and intelligence, 211793 nor any difference betwixt production, continuance and extinction of 211794 things; all which occur in one common essence of the supreme.
211795
211796 58. The varying idiocrasy subsisting in vegetables and minerals, 211797 makes them feel themselves as such, and causes their various natures and 211798 forms, as they have to this time.
211799
211800 59. The inward constitution of all immovable objects, makes them remain 211801 in their stationary states; and so of all other substances, according to 211802 their different names and natures.

211803
211804 60. Thus the inward crasis or quality of worms and insects, makes them
211805 conceive themselves according to their different kinds, and gives them
211806 their particular natures for ever.

211807
211808 61. So the people under the north pole know nothing about those in the 211809 south, except that they have the knowledge of themselves only (as ever 211810 subject to the intense cold of the frigid zone).

211811
211812 62. So also all kinds of moving and unmoving beings, are prepossessed 211813 with their own notions of things, and regard all others according to the 211814 peculiar nature of themselves. (Átmá vat &c.).

211815
211816 63. Again as the inhabitants of caves, know nothing of their outsiders; 211817 and as the frogs of dirty pools are unacquainted with pure water of 211818 streams; so is one sort of being ignorant of the nature of another.

211819
211820 64. But the inane intellect, residing in the form of the all pervasive 211821 mind, and all sustaining air; knows the natures of all things in all 211822 places.

211823
211824 65. The vital air that enters all bodies through the pores of their 211825 bodies, is the moving principle, that gives life and motion to all 211826 living beings.

211827
211828 66. Verily the mind is situated in all things, whether they are moving 211829 or immovable; and so is the air, which causes the motion in some, and 211830 quiescence in others.

211831
211832 67. Thus are all things but rays of the conscious soul, in this world of 211833 illusion, and continue in the same state as they have been from the 211834 beginning.

211835
211836 68. I have told you all about the nature of things in the world, and how 211837 un-realities come to appear as real unto us.

211838
211839 69. Lo here this king Vidúratha is about to breathe his last, and the 211840 garlands of flowers heaped on the corpse of thy husband Padma, are now
211841 being hung upon the breast of Vidúratha.

211842
211843 70. Lílá said:—Tell me goddess! by what way he entered the tomb of 211844 Padma, and how we may also go there to see what he has been doing in 211845 that place.

211847 71. The goddess said:—Man goes to all places by the way of his desires, 211848 and thinks also he goes to the distant future, in the spiritual form of 211849 pure intellect.

211850
211851 72. We shall go by the same way (aerial or spiritual), as you will like 211852 to take; because the bond of our friendship will make no difference in 211853 our choice and desires.

211854
211855 73. Vasishtha said:—The princess Lílá being relieved of her pain, by the 211856 recital of this agreeable narration; and her intellectual sight being 211857 brightened, by the blazing sun of spiritual light; beheld the insensible 211858 and unmoving Vidúratha, breathe out his last expiring breath.

211863 CHAPTER LVI.

211865 STATE OF THE SOUL AFTER DEATH.

211867
211868 Argument. The desire of the king, and his departure to the realm of 211869 death, followed by Lílá and the goddess; and their arrival to his 211870 former city.

Vasishtha continued:—In the meantime the eye-balls of the king became convoluted, and his lips and cheeks grew pale and dry, with his whole countenance; and there remained only the slender breath of life in him.

2. His body became as lean as a dry leaf, and his face turned as ghastly as the figure of death; his throat gurgled as the hoarsest beetles, and his lungs breathed with a bated breath.

3. His sight was darkened upon the insensibility of death, and his hopes were buried in the pit of despair; and the sensations of his external organs, were hid within the cavity of his heart.

4. His figure was as senseless as a picture in painting, and all his limbs were as motionless, as those of a statue carved upon a block of marble.

5. What need is there of a lengthy description, when it may be said in short; that his life quitted his body, as a bird flies off afar from a falling tree.

6. The two ladies with their divine eye-sight, beheld his animal spirit, flying upwards in the sky in its aerial form; and his consciousness disappearing, like the odour of a flower wafted by the wind.

7. His living soul being joined with its spiritual body, began to fly higher and higher in the air; as it was led by its inward desire or expectation of ascending to heaven.

8. The two ladies kept going after that conscious soul, like a couple of female bees, pursuing a particle of perfume borne afar in the air on the wings of the wind.

9. Then in a moment after the fainting fit of death was over; the conscious soul was roused from its insensibility, like some fragrance expanding itself with the breeze.

10. It saw the porters of death, carrying away the souls of the dead, that have resumed their grosser forms, by means of the mess offerings of their kinsmen to their manes.

11. After a long year's journey on the way, it reached at the distant abode of _Yama_, with the hope of reaping the reward of its acts; but found the gate fast beset by beasts of prey. (Like the Cerberus at the hellgate of Pluto).

12. Yama, on beholding the departed spirit of every body brought before him, ordered to find out its foul acts all along its life time.

13. On finding the prince's spirit spotless, and ever inclined to virtuous acts and to have been nourished by the grace of the goddess of wisdom:—

14. He ordered it to be released, and re-entered into its former dead body, which lay buried under the flowers in the tomb.

15. It was then let to fly in the etherial path, with the swiftness of a stone flung from a sling; and was followed by the living Lílá and the goddess in the air.

16. The living soul of the king thus sailing through the sky, did not observe the forms of the two ladies that followed it, though they saw it all along its course. (Because heavenly forms are invisible to mortal eyes and souls).

17. They traversed through many worlds, and soon passed the bounds of the extra-mundane systems; till they arrived at the solar world, whence they descended on this orb of the earth.

211940
211941 18. The two self-willed forms (of Lílá and the goddess), in company with 211942 the living soul of the king; arrived at the royal city of Padma, and 211943 entered the apartment of Lílá.
211944

211945 19. They entered in a trice and of their own free will, into the inside
211946 of the palace; as the air passes in flowers, and the sunbeams penetrate 211947 in the water, and the odors mix with the air.
211948

211949 20. Ráma asked:—How was it Sir, that they entered into the abode 211950 adjoining to the tomb, and how could they find out the way to it, the 211951 one having been dead a long time, and all three being but bodiless 211952 vacuity?
211953

211954 21. Vasishtha replied:—The tomb of the dead body of the prince, being 211955 impressed in his soul, and the object of its desire, led his spirit
211956 insensibly to it, as if it were by its inborn instinct.
211957

211958 22. Who does not know, that the endless desires which are sown in the 211959 human breast, like the countless seeds of a fig fruit, come of their own 211960 nature, to grow up to big trees in their time?
211961

211962 23. Just as the living body bears its seed—the subtile or linga deha 211963 in the heart, which germinates and grows to a tree at last; so every 211964 particle of the intellect, bears the mundane seed in itself. (The cosmos 211965 is contained in every individual soul).
211966

211967 24. As a man placed in one country, sees within himself his house, which 211968 is situated in a far distant land, so the soul sees the objects of his 211969 distant desires, ever present before it.
211970

211971 25. The living soul, ever longs after the best object of its desire;
211972 though it may undergo a hundred births, and become subject to the errors
211973 and delusions of his senses, and of this illusive world. (For whatever 211974 is born in the root, must come out in the seed; and that which is bred 211975 in the bones, must appear in the flesh).
211976

211977 26. Ráma rejoined:—There are many persons, that are free from their 211978 desire of receiving the funeral cake: now tell me, sir, what becomes of 211979 those souls, who get no cake offering at their Srádh.
211980

211981 27. Vasishtha replied:—The man having the desire of receiving the mess 211982 settled in his heart, and thinking it to be offered to him; is surely 211983 benefitted by its offering. (The funeral cake like every other food, is 211984 said to nourish the spirit, and cause its resuscitation in a new life 211985 and body).
211986

211987 28. Whatever is in the heart and mind, the same notions form the nature 211988 of living beings; and whether these are in their corporeal or 211989 incorporeal states, they think themselves as such beings and no other.
211990 (The sense of personal identity accompanies the soul everywhere).
211991

211992 29. The thought of having received the pinda cake, makes a man
211993 sapinda, though it is not actually offered to him; so on the other 211994 hand the thought of not being served with the cake, makes a sapinda 211995 become a nispinda (or one served with it becomes as one without it).
211996

211997 30. It is verily the desire of all living beings to be such and such as 211998 they have in their hearts, and that is the cause of their becoming so in 211999 reality. (Gloss. The ordinance of the necessity of cake offering,
212000 fosters its desire in the hearts of men. Or, which is the same thing, 212001 the desire of receiving the funeral cake, is fostered in the hearts of 212002 men, by the ordinance of Srádh).
212003

212004 31. It is the thought of a man, that makes the poison savour as nectar 212005 to his taste; and it is his very thought that makes an untruth seem as 212006 truth to him. (Gloss. The thought of a snake-catcher that he is the 212007 snake eating Garuda, makes him swallow the bitter poison as sweet honey; 212008 and the thought of snake-bite from the pricking of a thorn, mortifies a man by his false fear or imagination only).

32. Know this for certain, that no thought ever rises in any one without some cause or other; hence the desire or thought which is inherent in the spirit, is the sole cause of its regeneration on earth.

33. Nobody has ever seen or heard of any event, occurring without its proper cause; except the being of the Supreme Being, which is the causeless cause of all beings, from their state of not-being into being.

34. The desire is inherent in the intellect, like a dream in the soul; and the same appears in the form of acts, as the Will of God is manifested in his works of creation.

35. Ráma said:—How can the spirit that is conscious of its demerit, foster any desire of its future good; and how can it profit by the pious works of others for its salvation? (as the Srádh made by the relatives of the deceased).

36. Tell me too whether the pious acts of others, which are offered to the manes go for nothing; and whether the absence of future prospects of the unmeritorious ghost, or the benevolent wishes of others (for its future good) are to take effect.

37. Vasishtha said:—A desire is naturally raised in one at its proper time and place, and by application of appropriate acts and means; and the rising of the desire necessarily overcomes its absence. Gloss. So a Srádh done in proper season and manner, serves to the benefit of the desertless spirit.

38. The pious gifts made on behalf of the departed souls, accrue to them as their own acts; and the sense which they thus acquire of their worthiness, fills them with better hopes and desires of their future state. (Hence rises the hope of redemption by means of the redeeming son of man).

39. And as the stronger man gains the better of his adversary, so the later acts of piety drive away the former impiety from the spirit. Therefore the constant practice of pious acts is strictly enjoined in the Sástras.

40. Ráma said:—If the desire is raised at its proper time and place, how then could it rise in the beginning when there was no time nor place: (_i.e._, when all was void and yet Brahma had his desire and will).

41. You say that there are accessory causes, which give rise to the desires, but how could the will rise at first without any accessory cause whatever?

42. Vasishtha replied:—It is true, O long-armed Ráma, that there was neither time nor place in the beginning, when the Spirit of God was without its will.

43. And there being no accessory cause, there was not even the idea of the visible world, nor was it created or brought into existence; and it is so even now.

44. The phenomenal world has no existence, and all that is visible, is the manifestation of the Divine Intellect, which is ever lasting and imperishable.

45. This will I explain to you afterwards in a hundred different ways, and it is my main purpose to do so; but hear me now tell you what appertains to the matter under consideration.

46. They having got in that house, saw its inside beautifully decorated with chaplets of flowers as fresh as those of the spring season.

47. The inmates of the palace were quietly employed in their duties, and the corpse of the king was placed upon a bed of _mandara_ and _kunda_ flowers.

48. The sheet over the dead body, was also strewn over with wreaths of the same flowers; and there were the auspicious pots of water placed by the bed side.

49. The doors of the room were closed, and the windows were shut fast with their latches; the lamps cast a dim light on the white washed walls around, and the corpse was lying as a man in sleep, with the suppressed breathing of his mouth and nostrils.

50. There was the full bright moon, shining with her delightful lustre, and the beauty of the palace, put to blush the paradise of Indra; it was as charming as the pericarp of the lotus of Brahmá's birthplace, and it was as silent as dumbness or a dummy itself, and as beautiful as the fair moon in her fulness.

CHAPTER LVII.

PHENOMENA OF DREAMING.

Argument. Unsubstantiality _of the aerial_ body of Lílá and the Spiritual bodies of Yogis.

Vasishtha continued:—They beheld there the younger Lílá of Vidúratha, who had arrived there after her demise, and before the death of that king.

2. She was in her former habit and mode with the same body, and the same tone and tenor of her mind; she was also as beautiful in all her features, as in her former graceful form and figure when living.

3. She was the same in every part of her body, and wore the same apparel as before. She had the very ornaments on her person, with the difference that it was sitting quietly in the same place, and not moving about as before.

4. She kept flapping her pretty fan (chouri), over the corpse of the king; and was gracing the ground below, like the rising moon brightening the skies above.

5. She sat quiet, reclining her moonlike face on the palm of her left hand; and decorated with shining gems, she appeared as a bed of flowers, with new-blown blossoms on it.

6. With the glances of her beautiful eyes, she shed showers of flowers on all sides; and the brightness of her person, beamed with the beams of the etherial moon.

7. She seemed to have approached to the lord of men, like the goddess Lakshmi, appearing before the god Vishnu; and with the heaps of flowers before her, she seemed as Flora or the vernal season in person.

8. Her eyes were fixed on the countenance of her husband, as if she was pondering his future well-being; and there was a melancholy like that of the waning moon, spread over her face, to think of his present woeful state.

9. They beheld the damsel, who however had no sight of them; because their trust was in truth, and saw everything clearly; while her views being otherwise, she could not discern their spiritual forms.

10. Ráma said:—You have said Sir, that the former Lílá had repaired

212147 there in her reverie and spiritual form, by the favour of the goddess of 212148 wisdom.

212150 11. How do you now describe her as having a body, which I want to know 212151 how and whence it came to her.

212152
212153 12. Vasishtha replied:—What is this body of Lílá, Ráma! It is no more 212154 true than a false imagination of her gross spirit, like that of water in 212155 the mirage. (It is the conception of one's self as so and so, that 212156 impresses him with that belief also).

212157
212158 13. It is the spirit alone that fills the world, and all bodies are 212159 creations of the fancy. This spirit is the Intellect of God, and full of 212160 felicity in itself.

212162 14. The same understanding which Lílá had of herself to her end, 212163 accompanied her to her future state; and the same notion of her body 212164 followed her there, though it was reduced to dust, as the ice is 212165 dissolved into water.

212166
212167 15. The spiritual bodies also, are sometimes liable to fall into error, 212168 and think themselves as corporeal bodies, as we mistake a rope for the 212169 serpent.

212170
212171 16. The belief in the materiality of any body, as composed of the earth 212172 and other elements, is as false as it is to believe the hares to have 212173 horns on their heads.

212174
212175 17. Whoso thinks himself to have become a stag in his dream, has no
212176 need of seeking another stag for comparing himself with it. (_i.e._ Men 212177 are actuated by their own opinion of themselves).

212178
212179 18. An untruth appears as truth at one time, and disappears at another; 212180 as the error of a snake in a rope, vanishes upon the knowledge of its 212181 falsehood.

212182
212183 19. So the knowledge of the reality of all things, in the minds of the 212184 un-enlightened; is dispersed upon conviction of their un-reality in the 212185 minds of the enlightened.

212186
212187 20. But the ignorant, that have a belief in the reality of this world of 212188 dreams, believe also in the transmigration of the animal soul, like the 212189 revolution of the globe on its own axis.

212190
212191 21. Ráma asked:—If the bodies of Yogis be of a spiritual nature, how is 212192 it that they are seen to walk about in the sights of men?

212193
212194 22. Vasishtha replied:—The Yogimay take upon himself various forms, 212195 without the destruction of his former body; as the human soul may deem 212196 itself transformed to a stag or any other being in a dream, without 212197 undergoing any change in its spiritual essence. (The identity of the 212198 self is not lost under any form of the body. Locke).

212199
212200 23. His spiritual body is invisible to all, though it may appear as 212201 visible to their sight. It is like the particles of frost seen in 212202 sun-beams, and as the appearance of a white spot in autumnal sky (when 212203 there is no frost nor cloud in it).

212204
212205 24. No body can easily discern the features of a Yogi's body, nor are 212206 they discernible by other Yogis. They are as imperceptible as the 212207 features of a bird flying in the air.

212208
212209 25. It is from the error of judgment, that men think some Yogis to be 212210 dead and others to be living; but their spiritual bodies are never 212211 subject to death or common sight.

212212
212213 26. The embodied soul is subject to errors, from which the souls of 212214 Yogis are free; because their knowledge of truth has purged the mistake
212215 of a snake in the rope, from their souls.

27. What is this body and whence it is, and what of its existence or destruction? What is lasting remains forever and is freed from the ignorance it had before (and it is the soul which is ever lasting and free from error).

28. Ráma said:—Whether the embodied soul takes the spiritual form, or is it something other than this. Tell me this and remove my doubt.

29. Vasishtha said:—I have told this repeatedly to you, my good Ráma! and how is it that you do not understand it yet, that there exists only the spiritual body, and the material form is nothing?

30. It is by habit of constant meditation, that you must know your spiritual state, and subdue your sense of corporeality; and as you abstain from the latter, so you attain to the former state.

31. Then there will be an end of your sense of the gravity and solidity of objects, like the disappearance of the visions of a dreaming man, when he comes to wake.

32. The body of a Yogi becomes as light and subtile, as the evanescent appearances in a dream: (the fleeting objects of vision).

33. And as a dreaming man feels the lightness of his body, in his dreaming rambles; so the Yogi finds his solid body, as volatile as air in all places.

34. The expectation of the longlife of a master-head in his material body, is realized in the spiritual one, after the corpse has been burnt away. (Longevity consists in the longlife of the spirit and not of the body).

35. Every body must have to assume his spiritual frame afterwards; but the Yogi finds it in his life-time, by the enlightenment of his intellect.

36. As a man upon his waking from sleep, remembers his having an intellectual form in his dreaming state; so the Yogi is conscious of his spiritual body in his own intellect.

37. The notion of the corporeal body is a mere fallacy, like that of the snake in a rope; hence nothing is lost by the loss of this body, nor is anything gained by its production and regeneration.

38. Ráma said:—Now tell me Sir, what the inmates of the house thought this Lílá to be; whether they viewed her as an embodied being or a bodiless apparition appearing before them.

39. Vasishtha answered:—They took the sorrowful queen to be some friend of the king, and to have come from some place they knew not what and where.

40. They did not like to examine the matter, because it is the nature of the ignorant like that of brutes, to believe what they see, without investigation or consideration of its nature.

41. As a stone flung at random flies off from its mark, so the brutish and ignorant folks go astray, from hitting at the true mark of a thing placed before them.

42. As we know not what becomes of the objects of our dream, and whither they are fled upon our waking; such is the case with our material bodies, which are as false and fleeting as our delusive dreams.

43. Ráma said:—Tell me Sir, where the hill we dream of, is hid upon our waking; kindly remove my doubt, as the wind disperses the autumnal clouds.

44. Vasishtha said:—All things appearing in our dream or residing in our desire as the hill, &c., are absorbed in our consciousness whence they sprang; just as the motion of bodies subsides in the air which gives the vibration.

45. As the motion of the air mixes with the fixed ether, so the dreams and desires which we are conscious of, set in the unchanging soul whence they have their rise.

46. Our dreams like our knowledge of all other things, are made known to us by our consciousness, the nature of which is unknown to us as that of the inward soul. (Consciousness and the soul are represented as two different predicaments, and the one is not predicated of the other, as we say—the conscious soul).

47. We do not find our dreams and desires as distinct from our consciousness of them; they appertain to it in the same manner, as fluidity to water and motion to the air.

48. Whatever difference may appear to exist between them, is the effect of sheer ignorance; and this gross ignorance is the feature of this world, known as the phantom of fancy.

49. As it is impossible to conceive two co-eternal and co-existent causes together (as an efficient and a material cause); so it is wrong to suppose the dream as a distinct existence or otherwise, than an act of our consciousness.

50. There is no difference whatever between the dreaming and waking states; in dream we see a false city appearing to view, so in waking you behold the unreal world, standing as a reality before you.

51. Nothing can be truly existent that appears as true in a dream; this being always true of the visions in a dream, it is likewise so of the external phenomena, appearing to the sight in our day dreams.

52. As the hill in a dream, immediately disappears into airy nothing, so the material world sooner or later disappears into naught by thinking on its nihility.

53. A Yogi is seen by some to mount in the air, and by others as a dead body lying on the ground; and this is according to one's belief in his spiritual or material body, that every one sees him in his own way.

54. The view of the phenomenal world as distinct from the Unity, is as false as a sight in delusion or magical show; or a dream or delirium of the great Illusion—máyá.

55. Others who are blinded by similar errors, entertain as in a dream, the notion of their reproduction after being awakened from the insensibility of their death like sleep; but the spiritual body of the Yogi shines and soars upward, after passing over the mirage of the false appearances of the world.

CHAPTER LVIII.

REVIVAL OF PADMA.

Argument. Extinction of the Spiritual life of Lílá, and Restoration of Padma's Life.

Vasishtha continued:—It was in the meantime that the goddess of wisdom, stopped the course of Vidúratha's life, as we stop the flight of our minds at will.

2. Lílá said:—Tell me, goddess, what length of time has expired, since the corpse of the king was laid in this tomb, and I was absorbed in my deep meditation.

3. The goddess replied:—A month has passed since these maid servants of thine have been waiting here for watching thy body, which they thought lay asleep in the room.

4. Hear excellent lady! what has become of thy body, after it was rotten in a fortnight and evaporated in the air.

5. Seeing thy lifeless corpse lying as cold as frost on the ground, and turning as dry as a log of wood, or rather as a withered leaf on the floor;—

6. The royal ministers thought thee to be dead of thyself (a suicide), and removed thy putrid carcase out of the room.

7. And what more shall I say, than they laid thy corpse on a heap of sandal wood, and having set fire to the pile with the sprinkling of ghee, they reduced it to ashes in a short while.

8. Then the family raised a loud cry that their queen was dead, and wept bitterly for sometime, after which they performed thy funeral ceremonies.

9. Now when they will behold thee coming here in thy same body, they must be astonished to think thee as returned from the next world of the dead.

10. Now my daughter, when thou shalt appear before them in this thy purer and spiritual form, they must look upon thee with astonishment.

11. For thou hast not thy former form at present, but it is changed to a purer one, agreeably to the tenor and temperament of thy mind. (Lit. according to the desire in thy heart).

12. For every body beholds every thing without him, according to his inward feelings; as for example the sight of shadowy ghosts is frequent to children, that have a fear of devils at heart.

13. Now, O beauteous lady! Thou art an adept in spiritualism, and hast a spiritual body on thee, and hast forgotten and forsaken thy former body, with all the desires connate with it.

14. The view of material bodies, is lost to the sight of spiritualists; and the intelligent view them in the light of autumnal clouds, which are void of substance. (_i.e._ The flimsy clouds which are without rain-water in them).

15. On attainment of the spiritual state, the material body becomes as an empty cloud, and as a flower without its odor.

16. When a man of pure desire, is conscious of his attaining the spiritual state; he loses the remembrance of his material body, as a youth forgets his embryonic state.

17. It is now the thirty first day that we have arrived at this place; and I have caused the maid servants here, to fall into a fast sleep this morning.

18. Now Lílá! let us advance before the wilful Lílá, and then discover to her at our will, the form of the truthful Lílá, and her manner and conduct to thee.

19. Vasishtha said:—So saying, they wished themselves to be perceived by the wilful Lílá, and stood manifest to her sight in their etherial forms of the goddess and her inspired dame.

20. At this instant the Lílá of Vidúratha, looked upon them with her staring eyes; and found the room lighted up by the full lustre of their bodies.

21. The apartment seemed to be lighted by the bright orb of the moon, and its wall washed over with liquid gold; the ground floor shone as paved with ice, and all was full of splendour.

22. After seeing the brightness of the bed chamber, Lílá looked up at the goddess and the other Lílá, and rising respectfully before them, she fell at their feet.

23. Be victorious, O ye goddesses! she said, that have blessed me with your visit, and know that know all, that I have come here first as a preparer of your way. (Lit. as the sweeper of your path).

24. As she was speaking in this manner, they received her with good grace, and then all the three sat together on a bedding in their youthful bloom, like luxuriant creepers on the snow capt top of Meru.

25. The goddess said:—Tell us daughter, how you came here before ourselves, how you have been, and what you have seen on your way hither.

26. The younger Lílá answered:—As I lay insensible on that spot (upon the shock of my death), I was enveloped in darkness like the new moon, and felt myself burnt away by the flame of a conflagration (_i.e._, funeral fire).

27. I had no sense nor thought of anything good or bad, but remained with my eyes closed under my eye-lids.

28. Then I found myself, O great goddess! after I had recovered from my anaesthesia of death, to assume (by mistake a new body agreeably to my former impression), and to be translated at once into the midst of the sky.

29. I mounted on the vehicle of winds, and was borne like fragrance to this mansion through the etherial space.

30. I found this house guarded by its warders, and lighted with lamps, and having a costly bedstead placed in the midst of it.

31. I am looking here upon this corpse, as my husband Vidúratha, who has been sleeping here with his body covered under the flowers, like the vernal god in a flower garden.

32. I thought he was taking his rest, after the fatigue of the warfare, and did not like to disturb his repose in this place.

33. I have now related to you, my gracious goddesses! all that I have seen and thought of, since I have been restored to my new life.

34. The goddess spake:—Now I tell thee Lílá, that hast such beautiful eyes, and movest like a swan, that I will raise the corpse of the king to life from his bed in this bier.

35. Saying so, she breathed the breath of life as the lotus lets off its fragrance; and it fled into the nostrils of the carcase, like a creeping plant crawls into a hole.

36. It entered into the heart through the vital sheath, as the wind penetrates into the hole of a bamboo; and the breath of life was fraught with desires, as the waves of the sea sparkle with pearls.

37. The infusion of life, added to the colour of the face and body of king Padma; as the rain-water refreshes the fading lotus in a drought.

38. By degrees the members of the body became renovated, like a garden with its returning flowering season; and as the sides of a hill become virescent, with fresh grown bushes and creepers.

39. The person of the king shone as the queen of the stars, with all her digits of the full moon, when she enlightens the whole world, with the beams of her radiant face.

40. All his limbs became as tender and roscid, as the branches of trees in spring; and they regained their bright and golden hue, like the flowers of the vernal season.

41. He oped his eyes which were as clear as the sky, with their two pupils rolling as the two orbs of light; and enlightening the world, with their charming and auspicious beams.

42. He raised his body, as the Vindhya mountain uplifts its head, and cried, "who waits there" with a grave and hoarse voice.

43. The two Lílás responded to him saying:—"your commands;" when he beheld the two Lílás in attendance upon him, and lowly bending themselves at his feet.

44. Both of them were of the same form and features, and of the like demeanour and deportment towards him. They were alike to one another in their voice and action, as in their joy and gladness at his rising.

45. Then looking upon them he asked, "what art thou and who is she"? At this the elder Lílá responded to him saying—"deign to hear what I have to say".

46. I am Lílá thy former consort, and was joined as twain in one with thee, as sounds and their senses are combined together.

47. The other Lílá is but a reflexion of myself, and cast by my free will for your service.

48. The lady sitting here beside the bed, is the goddess of wisdom—the blessed Sarasvatí, and mother of the three worlds; set her on the golden seat before you.

49. It is by virtue of our great merit, that she has presented herself to our sight, and brought us back from other worlds to your presence in this place.

50. Hearing this, the lotus-eyed king, rose from his seat, and with pendant wreaths of flowers and a strap of cloth hung about his neck, prostrated himself at her feet.

51. He exclaimed:—I hail thee, O divine Sarasvatí! that dost confer all blessings on mankind. Deign to confer on me the blessings of understanding and riches with a long life.

52. As he was saying so, the goddess touched him with her hand and said, "be thou my son, possessed of thy desired blessings, and gain thy blessed abode in future.

53. "Let all evils and evil thoughts be far from thee, and all thy discomforts be dispersed from this place; let an everlasting joy alight in thine hearts, and a thick population fill thy happy realm. May all prosperity attend on thee for ever."

CHAPTER LIX.

EXTINCTION OF PADMA'S LIFE.

Argument. Great joy on the King's return to Life. His Government of the kingdom and his final Liberation.

Vasishtha said:—"Be it so," said Sarasvatí and disappeared in the air; and the people rose in the morning with their revived king.

2. He embraced the nascent Lílá, who embraced him in her turn, and they were exceeding glad in their coming to life again.

3. The palace was filled with loud acclamations of joy as those of giddy revelry: and the citizens were full of mirth and merry, song and music.

4. The shouts of victory, and sounds of huzzas and heydays, resounded in the air, and the people elated with joy, thronged at the royal courtyard to see their king.

5. The genii of the Siddhas and Vidyádhara, dropped down handfuls of flowers from above; and the sound of drums and kettles, and trumpets and conches, resounded on all sides.

6. The elephants roared aloud on the outside, with their uplifted trunks; and crowds of females filled the inner court-yard, with their loud rejoicings.

7. Men bearing presents to the king, fell upon one another at their mutual clashing; and others wearing the flowery chaplets on their heads and hairs, moved gracefully all about.

8. The red turbans of joy on the heads of the chiefs and host of citizens, and the waving of the reddish palms of dancing girls, filled the sky with a bed of red lotuses.

9. The ground also was strewn over with rosy flowers, by foot-falls of dancers with their reddish soles; and the pendant earrings of ballet girls, which flourished with the oscillation of their heads and shoulders, waved in the air like flowers of gold.

10. The silken veils which like autumnal clouds, covered the faces of fairy damsels in their dancing, glittered as so many moons shining in the court-yard.

11. The people then retired to their respective abodes, with loud applause of the queen's return with her husband from the other world.

12. The king Padma heard of his adventures from the hearsay of his subjects, and made his purificatory ablution, with the waters of the four seas of the earth.

13. Then the royal ministers and ministerial Bráhmans, joined together in the act of his installation, like the synod of immortals, meeting at the inauguration of Indra.

14. The two Lílás continued in company with the king, to relate with delight their respective adventures, and the wisdom they had gathered thereby.

15. It was thus by grace of the genius of wisdom and their own experience, that this king Padma and his two queens, obtained their prosperity equal to that of the three worlds.

16. The king, who was fraught with the wisdom imparted to him by the goddess; continued to rule over his kingdom for thousands of years, in company with his consorts.

17. They reigned on earth, in their state of living liberation for myriads of years; and then receiving the perfect knowledge of the holy Siddhas, they became wholly liberated after their deaths.

18. The happy pair having reigned jointly, over their delightful realm of ever increasing population, and which was graced by learned men and righteous people, knowing their own rights and duties of doing good to all mankind, became freed from the burden of their state affairs for ever.

CHAPTER LX.

ON DURATION AND TIME AND THOUGHTS OF THE MIND.

Argument. The reason of introducing the two Lílás in the tale. The one as the counterpart of the other.

Vasishtha said:—I have related to you this tale, prince! for removing your error of the phenomenal world. Mind this tale of Lílá, and renounce your misconception of the gross material world.

2. The substantiality of phenomena is a _nil_ by itself, and requires no pains to invalidate it. It is hard to disprove a reality; but there is no difficulty in effacing a falsehood from the mind.

3. True knowledge consists in viewing the visibles as void, and knowing the one vacuum as the sole unity and real entity; one loses himself at last in this infinite vacuity. (Vasishtha was a _súnya vádi_ or vacuist, which Sankarácharya was at the pains to refute in his Dig-vijaya).

4. When the self-born Brahmá created the world from nothing, and without the aid of any material or elementary body; it is plain that there was an eternal void, and all these are but manifestations of the vacuous soul. (The _Teom_ and _Beom_ of Genesis, corresponding with _Tama_ and _Vyom_ of the Veda, were the origin of creation).

5. The same creative soul, has spread the seeds of its consciousness in the stream of creation, and these produce the images as they incessantly appear to us, unless we take the pains to repress them.

6. The appearance of the world, is but a perspective of the sphere of divine intellect; and contained in the small space of human intellect within the soul; as in a transparent particle of sand.

7. Such being the case, say what is the essence of this erroneous conception, and what may be our desires of reliance in it, and what can be the meaning either of destiny or necessity? (The predestination and chance, to which the Fatalists ascribe the origination of the universe).

8. This entire whole which is visible to the eye, is but a false appearance as that of magic; and there is no truth nor substance in a magic show.

9. Ráma said:—Oh! the wondrous exposition of the world, that you have now explained to me. It refreshes my soul, as the moon-beams revive the blades of grass, that have been burnt down by a conflagration.

10. It is after so long, that I have come to know the truly knowable; such as what and how it is, and the manner whereby, whence and when it is to be known.

11. I have my peace and rest in pondering on this wonderful theory, and your elucidation of the doctrines of the Sruti Sástras.

12. But tell me this one thing to remove my doubt, as my ears are never satiate, with drinking the nectarious juice of your sweet speech.

13. Tell me the time, which transpired during the three births of Lílá's husband. Was it the duration of a day and night in one case, and of a month in another, and the period of a whole year in the case of Vidúratha?

14. Or did any one of them live for many years, and whether they were of short or longer durations, according to the measure of men, gods or Brahmá. (Because a human year is a day and night of the polar gods, and a moment of the cycle of Brahmá. And revolution of the whole planetary system to the same point makes a day of Brahmá).

15. Please sir, kindly tell me this, because little hearing is not sufficient to me, as a drop of water is not enough to moisten the dry soil or the parched ground of summer heat.

16. Vasishtha said:—Know sinless Ráma! that whosoever thinks of anything in any manner at any place or time, he comes to feel the same in the same manner, and in the same place and time.

17. Take for instance the destructive poison, which becomes as ambrosia to venomous insects, that take it for their dainty nourishment; and so is an enemy turning to a friend by your friendly behaviour unto him. (In both cases the evil turns to good by our taking it as such).

18. And the manner in which all beings consider themselves, and all others for a length of time; the same they seem to be by their mode and habit of thinking, as if it were by an act of destiny. (i.e. They consider their thoughts of things as their destined nature, which is not so in reality; for fair is foul and foul is fair; according as our judgments declare).

19. The manner in which the active intellect represents a thing in the soul, the same is imprinted in the consciousness of its own nature. (Here the Chit is said to be the intellectus agens and consciousness—Samvid—the intellectus patiens. The motion of the mind gives us the impressions of the swiftness and slowness of time).

20. When our consciousness represents a twinkling of the eye as a Kalpa, we are led to believe a single moment an age of long duration. (As a short nap appears an age in dreaming), and (a long age as a moment as in the case of the seven sleepers of Kehef).

21. And when we are conscious of or think a Kalpa age as a twinkling, the Kalpa age is thought to pass as a moment; and so a long night in our unconscious sleep, appears as a moment upon waking.

22. The night appears a longsome age, to the long suffering sick, while it seems as a moment, in the nightly revels of the merry; so a moment appears as an age in the dream, and an age passes off as a moment in the state of insensibility. (The length and shortness of duration, depending on our consciousness and insensibility of the succession of our ideas. (See Locke and Kant on our idea of time)).

23. The notions of the resurrection of the dead, and of one's metempsychosis, and being re-born in a new body; of his being a boy, youth or old man; and of his migrations to different places at the distance of hundreds of leagues, are all but the phenomena of sleep, and retrospective views in a dream.

24. King Haris Chandra is said, to have thought a single night as a dozen of years; and the prince Lavana to have passed his long life of a hundred years as the space of a single night. (So the seven sleepers of Kehef passed a long period as one night, and so of others).[1]

25. What was a moment to Brahmá, was the whole age of the life-time of Manu (Noah); and what is a day to Vishnu, constitutes the long period of the life-time of Brahmá. (This alluded to the comparative differences in the cycles of planetary bodies presided by the different deities; such as Jupiter's cycle of 60 years round the sun, is but one year to the presiding god of that planet).

26. The whole life-time of Vishnu, is but one day of the sedate Siva; for one whose mind is motionless in his fixed meditation, is unconscious of the change of days and nights and of seasons and years. (Since the meditative mind is insensible of the fluctuation of its ideas, or that there is an utter quietus of them in the quietism of the Yogi's mind).
27. There is no substance nor the substantive world, in the mind of the meditative Yogi (who views them in their abstract light); and to whom the sweet pleasures of the world, appear as bitter, as they are thought to be the bane of his true felicity.
28. The bitter seems to be sweet, by being thought to be so; and what is unfavorable, becomes favorable as that which is friendly comes to be unfriendly by being taken in their contrary senses. (The mind can make a heaven of hell and a hell of a heaven. Milton).
29. Thus Rāma! it is by habitual meditation, that we gain the abstract knowledge of things; as on the other hand we forget what we learnt, by want of their recapitulation. (Habit is second nature, and practice is the parent of productions).
30. These by their habitude of thinking, find every thing in a state of positive rest; while the unthinking fall into the errors of the revolutionary world, as a boat-passenger thinks the land and objects on the shore, to be receding from and revolving around him.
31. Thus the unthinking part of mankind, and those wandering in their error, think the world to be moving about them; but the thinking mind, sees the whole as an empty void, and full of phantoms, as one sees in his dream.
32. It is the thought (erroneous conception), that shows the white as black and blue; and it is the mistake of judgment, that makes one rejoice or sorrow at the events of life.
33. The unthinking are led to imagine a house where there is none; and the ignorant are infatuated to the belief of ghosts, as they are the killers of their lives.
34. It is reminiscence or memory, which raises the dream as her consort; and which represents things as they are presented to it, by the thoughts of the waking state.
35. The dream is as unreal as the empty vacuity, abiding in the hollow receptacle of the intellectual soul; it overspreads the mind like the shadow of a cloud, and fills it with images like those of a puppet-show under the magic lantern.
36. Know the phenomena of the revolving worlds, to be no more in reality, than mere resultants of the vibrations of the mind, in the empty space of the soul; and as the motions and gestures of the fancied hobgoblins, to the sight of children.
37. All this is but a magical illusion, without any substance or basis of itself; and all these imposing scenes of vision, are but the empty and aerial sights of dreams.
38. Just as the waking man, beholds the wondrous world before him, so also does sleeping man see the same; and both of them resemble the insensible pillar, which finds the images of statues engraved upon it (because the soul is ever awake in every state of all living bodies).
39. The great monument of the Divine Spirit, has the figure of the created world, carved in itself in the same manner, as I see a troop of soldiers passing before me in my dream. (All these appear to be in action, in their true state of nullity and inaction).
40. So is this waking world asleep in the soul of Brahma, and rises in his mind as the vegetable world springs from the sap lying hid in the earth, which gives it its growth and vernal bloom.

41. So likewise does the creation lie hid in, and spring from the Supreme Spirit; as the brightness of gold ornaments is contained in, and comes out of the material metal. (The Divine Spirit is both the material and efficient cause of creation—_ex quo & a quo_.)

42. Every atom of creation, is settled in the plenum of Divine spirit; as all the members of the body, are set in the person of their possessor.

43. The visible world has the same relation, to the bodiless and undivided spirit of God; as one fighting in a dream bears to his antagonist (both believing in their reality, while both of them are unreal in their bodies).

44. Thus the real and unreal, the spirit and the world, all dwindled into vacuum, at the great _Kalpánta_ annihilation of creation, except the intellect of God which comprises the world in itself.

45. The causality of the one (_i.e._ the spirit of God), and the unreality of the world cannot be true (since nothing unreal can come out of the real). Except Brahm—the all (_to pan_), there is no other cause, as a Brahmá or any other; the Divine Intelligence is the only cause and constituent of its productions.

46. Ráma asked:—But what cause was it that represented the citizens, counsellors and ministers of Vidúratha's royal house also to Lílá's vision, in the same manner as her lord the king, (who was alone the object of her thought)?

47. Vasishtha said:—All other thoughts are associated with the principal one in the intellect, in the same manner as the high winds are accompaniments of the storm.

48. The association of thoughts, follows one another in a long and perpetual train; and caused the succession of the sights of the ministers, citizens and subjects of the king, in Lílá's vision one after the other.

49. In this way the thought that the king was born of such and such a family, naturally introduced the thoughts of his palace and city, and of those that dwelt in them.

50. It is in vain to enquire into the cause and manner, of the intellect's being combined with its thoughts at all times; since it is called the gem of thoughts (Chintámani), and must be always accompanied with its radiating thoughts, like a brilliant gem with its rays. (_i.e._ Thinking is the inseparable attribute of the mind).

51. Padma thought to become a king like Vidúratha, in the proper discharge of the duties of his royal family; and this constant thought of himself as such, cast the mould of the mind and manner of Vidúratha upon him (_i.e._ he looked himself in the light of that king).

52. All animate beings of every kind, are but models of their own thoughts, like looking-glasses showing their inward reflexions to the sight. (The innate man appearing in his outward figure, is a verity in physiognomy).

53. The mind which is fixed in the meditation of God, and remains unshaken amidst the turmoils of the world; is fraught with perfect rest, and preserves the composure of the soul, until its final liberation from the bondage of the body.

54. But the thoughts of the fluctuating enjoyments of this world, alternately represented in the mirror of the mind, like the shadows of passing scenes upon a looking glass.

55. It requires therefore a great force of the mind, to overcome its worldly thoughts, and turn them to the channel of truth; as the greater force of the main current of a river, leads its tributaries to the ocean.

56. But the mind is greatly disturbed, when the worldly and spiritual thoughts, press it with equal force to both ways; and it is then, that the greater force leads it onward in either way. (There is no midway like that of the Mádhyamikas between this world and the next).

Gloss. The worldly and spiritual thoughts being equally forcible, they naturally struggle in the mind, and that which is of greater force overcomes the other.

57. Such is the case with all the myriads of beings, whether are living, dead or to come to life; and the same accidents take place in the particles of all human minds (like the concussions of atomic forces).

58. All this is the empty sphere of the Intellect, all quiet and without any basis or substratum. It is neither peopled nor filled by any thing except its own native thoughts.

59. All these appear as dreams, even in our unsleeping states, and have no form or figure in the sight of the wise. The perception of their positive existence, is but a misconception of their negative inexistence.

60. There really exists but one omnipotent and all pervasive Spirit, which shows itself in diverse forms like the flowers, fruits and leaves of trees, all appearing from the self-same woody trunk (which like the great Brahma is the origin of all its off-shoots.)

61. He who knows the increate Brahma to be the measurer, measure and the thing measured, (i.e. the creator, created and the creation), to be all one and himself, can never forget this certain truth of unity, nor ever fall into the error of dualism of the cause and effect.

62. There is but one Being (SAT), who is Holy and without beginning; and who, though he appears to be of the forms of light and darkness, and of space and time, doth never rise nor set anywhere. He is without beginning, middle or end; and remains as a vast expanse of water, exhibiting itself in its waves and currents.

63. The notion of myself, thyself and the objective world, are but effusions of our perverted understandings; and it is ignorance only that shows the One as many within the Sheath of the mind, according as it imagines it to be.

CHAPTER LXI.

ON THE NATURE OF THE WORLD.

Argument. Proofs of the unreality of the world, leading to the Quietism of the Spirit.

Ráma said:—Please sir, explain to me whence arises this error of our knowledge of the objective world, without a cause of this error. (The True God cannot lead us to the knowledge of untruth).

2. Vasishtha said:—Because we have the knowledge of all things (i.e. the objective), to be contained alike in our consciousness (as of the subjective self); it is plain that this eternal and increate self (or soul), is the cause and container of them all at all times.

3. That which has an insight or intuitive knowledge of all things, which are expressed by words and their meanings, is Brahma—the soul and no other; and nothing that is meant by any significant term, has a different form of its own. (It is the doctrine of nominalism that the notions conveyed by words have no realities corresponding with them in the mind, and have no existence but as mere names).

4. As the quality of a bracelet is not different from its substance of gold, nor that of a wave from the water; so the expansion of the world, is not distinct from the spirit of God. (The spirit inflated and produced the world out of itself. Sruti).

5. It is Brahma that is manifest in the form of the world, and not the world that appears as God; and so doth gold display itself in the form of a bracelet, and not the bracelet that takes the nature of gold.

6. As the whole is displayed in all its various parts, so the entire intellect shows itself in all the various operations of the mind composing the world. (The intellect displaying the mind, and this the world).

7. It is ignorance of the infinite and eternal Spirit of God, that exhibits itself as myself, thyself and the world itself in the mind. (_i.e._ The knowledge both of the subjective and objective results from ignorance of the only One—tanmātram).

8. As the shades of different colours in gems, are not apart from the gems; so the notions of one's self and the world are the shades inherent in the self-same intellect.

9. Like waves appearing on the surface of the undulated waters of the deep; this so-called and meaningless creation, is but a _phasis_ in the Divine Intellect.

10. Neither does the Spirit of God reside in the creation, nor does the creation subsist in the Divine Spirit (like waves in the waters); nor is there such relation as of a part with the whole between them. (These are _not_ parts of one undivided whole).

11. One should meditate on his intellect as the form of the Divine Intellect, in his own consciousness of it; and he will feel the Divinity stirring within himself, as it were stirred by the breath of a breeze. (There is a divinity stirring within us, Addition).

12. The minute particle of the vacuous intellect, will then appear in its wondrous form of a void, within the empty space of his conscious mind. (The primary hypostasis of the vacuous soul being but a void, its attributes of the intellect and mind, are of the same form).

13. He then finds this vacuous form stirring in himself as the airy spirit, with its property of feeling, as it is felt in the _flatus venti_ or breath of air. (This is the Spirit of God).

14. The God then assumes a luminous form as the state of his own substantiality; and this is posited in the sheath of the intellect as a spark of fire. (This is the holy light of the God of glory or glorious God).

15. The light then melts into water as the self-same substance of itself; and this fluid substance contains in it the property of taste. (This is the liquid state of the floating spirit before creation).

16. The same is condensed in the form of a solid substance, which is the same with the Divine Mind. This becomes the earth bearing in its bosom the property of smell. (The earth being produced from the scum of water, is dissolved again into its watery form).

17. Again God represents himself to our intellect, as one infinite and uniform duration; and its measures in twinklings and other divisions, are but manifestations of the succession of our thoughts. (Prakachanamvidah parampará—is the very doctrine of Locke and others).

18. The other states in which God presents himself to our intellects are that, He is Holy, infinitely glorious, seen within us, [2] and without beginning, middle and end; that, He has no rising nor setting, and subsists of Himself without a substratum and as the substratum of all.

19. This knowledge of God is bliss itself, and his creation is identic with himself. Ignorance of God leads to the knowledge of the objective world, and its extinction is the way to know the eternity of His existence.

20. Brahma is conceived in the same manner in our souls, as He is represented to us by our intellects; just as we know all other things according to our ideas of them, in our all comprehensive minds.

21. Of these, those things only are true, the notions of which we derive from the dictates of our well-directed understandings; as all those are untrue, which the mind paints to us from the impressions of the senses and the meanings of words; which are incapable of expressing the nature of the undefinable and indescribable God (whom no words can express—_Yato vácho nivastante_. (Sruti))

22. Know the unreal world which appears as real, and the reality of God which appears as unreality, to be of the manner of the air in motion and at rest. The visible world like the current air, appears true to them, that have no knowledge of the invisible God, who is as calm as the still air underlying the etherial air and its fluctuations.

23. A thing may appear different from another, and yet be the same with it; as the light in the fire is the selfsame fire. So the visible world arising from the invisible Brahma, appears as another reality; though it is same with the reality of God.

24. All things whether in being or not being, subsist in God as their invisible and unknown source and cause; as the unscooped earth is the cause of the would-be doll, the unhewn tree of a future statue, and the soot of the ink not _in esse_. (So all future statues are contained in the unhewn marbles, according to Aristotle).

25. One thing is exhibited as another in the great desert of the Divine Mind, which shows the phenomena of the world as figures in the mirage.

26. The wise soul thinks this world as one with its source—the Divine Intellect, as he considers the tree no way different from its parent seed.

27. As the sweetness of milk, the pungency of pepper, the fluidity of water, and the motion of winds, are the inseparable properties of their substances:—

28. So this creation is inseparable from the spirit of Brahma, and is a mere form of the one Supreme soul, beside which there is nothing in reality. (Whose body nature is, and God the soul).

29. This world is the manifestation of the lustre of the gem of Divine mind, and has no other cause except the essence of Brahma, which is no other than its material cause—the Supreme soul itself.

30. The will, the mind, the living soul, and its consciousness, are all the offspring of Divine intellection; because there is nothing that can be produced by exertion of any power without direction of the Intellect.

31. There is nothing that rises or sets anywhere, nor appears or disappears at any time; but everything is unborn at all times, and lies quiet in the Divine Intellect, which is as solid as a massive rock.

213113
213114 32. To attribute the formation of these multitudes of the combination of 213115 atoms, and to suppose every particle to be composed of minutest
213116 infinitesimals; are but vagaries of imagination, as none of them could 213117 combine of themselves except by direction of the eternal mind. (Matter 213118 having no force nor design in itself).

213119
213120 33. All force resides in some living principle, as the waking, sleeping
213121 and dreaming states appertain to the living soul; and as the undulation
213122 of waves subsists in the water; (or) as the current of the stream lies 213123 hidden in it.

213124
213125 34. When the living soul feels its inappetency towards worldly 213126 enjoyments, it is then said to have reached to his highest perfection by 213127 the Sruti (such as:—nishkāma— or abandonment of the desire of fruition, 213128 is the highest state of human felicity).

213129
213130 35. As the mind is freed from its choice and dislike of things, so is 213131 the soul liberated by avoiding its egoism and personality, and then it
213132 has no more to be conscious of the pain, attending upon a future birth 213133 and transmigration.

213134
213135 36. Whoso comes to know in his understanding, this state of supreme and 213136 inexpressible felicity; he is sure to overcome all his worldly 213137 appetites, that bind him fast to this earth.

213138
213139 37. But whoso labours in his mind under his affections to this world, he 213140 has to rove continually in it as in the whirlpool of a stream, and 213141 destroys the supreme felicity of his soul in his continuous turmoil.

213142
213143 38. It was the lotus-born Brahmá, that was conscious of his egoism at 213144 first, and who has by the will of his mind, spread out this universe.
213145 (He is eternally acting, and has not retired after his act of creation).

213146 213147 213148 213149 213150 CHAPTER LXII.

213151 213152 INTERPRETATION OF DESTINY.

213154
213155 Argument. The erroneous conception of creation and of Destiny both as 213156 active and inactive.

213157
213158
213159 Vasishtha continued:—These myriads of worlds and the millenniums of 213160 kalpa—ages, are no more real in themselves than our false computation
213161 of the millionth part of an atom or the twinkling of an eye.

213162
213163 2. It is our error that represents them as true to us, though they are 213164 as false as our calculation of those infinitesimals.

213165
213166 3. These creations whether past or future, follow one another in endless
213167 succession, like the overflowing currents of water, with all the waves, 213168 eddies and whirlpools in them.

213169
213170 4. The prospect of these created worlds is as false, as the delusive 213171 mirage, which presents a stream of water, flowing with strings of 213172 flowers, fallen from the plants on the shore.

213173
213174 5. The conceptional creation is as baseless as a city in a dream or 213175 magic show; or as mountain in fiction, or an imaginary castle in air.

213176
213177 (It is a flatus venti, and not based on any thing real; but has a mere 213178 psychological existence, depending on fancy and imagination).

213179
213180 6. Rāma said:—Sir, the drift of your reasoning, leads to the 213181 establishment of the identity of the conceptional creation with the creator; and that this unity of both is the belief of the learned and wise. (So says Hegel: "creation is the reality of God; it is God passing into activity" Lewy's Hist. Ph. II p. 626).

7. Now tell me, what you have to say with regard to the material bodies, which these existence bear on earth; and what is the cause that the body is subject to the casualties unknown to the inward spirits. (_i.e._ The body is subject to material laws, but not so the immaterial spirit which has no change).

8. Vasishtha replied:—There is a supernatural and active energy of the Divine Intellect, called the predominant Decree, Fate or Destiny, which must come to pass, and bear its command over all our actions and desires. (Destiny is irresistible, being the decree of Providence, governing all events and our free wills also. Fate is the personification of the female agency of god. Here Vasishtha is a fatalist also; but his fate is the Divine decree).

9. She is invested from the beginning with irresistible and multifarious powers; and destines the manner in which every thing is to take place and continue for ever. (The philosophical destiny is the sum of the laws of universe, of matter and mind).

10. She is the essential cause of all essence, and the chief mover of the intellect; she is styled as the great power of powers, and remains as the great viewer of all things.

11. She is called the great agency and the great producer of all events; She is known as the chief mover of occurrences, and she is the soul and source of all accidents. (The mythological Destiny is superior to gods and men, and rules over the great Jove himself).

12. She whirls the worlds as straws, and bears her sway over the deities and demons; she commands the Nága dragons and the mountain monsters to the end of time.

13. She is sometimes thought to be an attribute of Divine essence, and to remain pictured in her ever varying colours in the hollow vacuity of the Divine Mind. (The theological destiny is the Almighty Will of God and his foreknowledge also; before which the fates float about, as if they are drawn up in variegated pictures).

14. The learned have explained Brahmá the Demiurge, to be identic with the Spirit of Brahma, for the understanding of those that are ignorant in spiritual knowledge; and by destiny they mean his creation. (_i.e._ Creation is destination of the preordaining and irrevocable will of God).

15. The immovable spirit of Brahmá, appears to be full of moving creatures and the infinity of Divine existence, seems to teem with the finite creation in the midst of it, like a grove of trees growing under the concavity of the hollow sky.

16. The unawaking spirit of God reflected various images in itself (as in a dream), likening to the reflection of a dense forest in the lens of a crystal stone: and these were understood by the demiurgus Brahmá, as the prototype of the destined creation, in the hollow sphere of the Divine mind.

17. The Intellect naturally exhibits a variety of forms in itself, as the body of an embodied person, shows its various members to view; and these were taken by the lotus-born Brahmá, as the several parts in the great body of the cosmos. (The Intellect is the phantasmagoria of the world, and the Demiurge is the formal framer of it).

18. This foreknowledge of events imprinted in the Intellect of God, is called Destiny, which extends over all things at all times. (This is Fatum christianum, that every thing is regulated by foreknowledge and Providence).

19. The meaning of Destiny, comprises the knowledge of the causes, which move, support and sustain all things in their proper order; and that such and such causes, must produce such and such effects for ever. (This is the Stoic Fate of Jewish Essences; or a concatenation of causes whence all things necessarily result).
20. This destiny is the force or mobile power, that moves all men and animals, and vegetable and inanimate creations; it is the beginning (or primary source) of the time and motion of all beings. (It is fatum from fari—the word or decree of Providence, that was the beginning of all existence.)
21. It is combined with Divine power, as the power divine is combined with it; and this combination of them into one, is the cause of the production and existence of the world.
22. It is the union or conformity of human exertion, with the course of destiny or decree of God, that is productive of certain ends, which are respectively called their destiny and destined effects. (Here Destiny is defined as the combination of human and superhuman powers; and that the co-operation of natural and supernatural agencies, are necessary to the production of effects).
23. What more have you to ask me, Ráma! with regard to destiny and self-exertion; when I tell you that it is destined to all beings to betake themselves to their proper actions, in the destined or prescribed manner, in order to bring about the desired result? (Their destiny is equal to Vidhi or fixed laws, which were combined in Brahmá).
24. When a predestinarian sits idle and quiet, under the belief of being fed by his fixed lot; he is then said to depend on his destiny alone (as a fatalist).
25. By sitting idle in the manner of a waiter on Providence, for the whole of his lifetime, he gains nothing; but comes to lose his good sense and energy in a short time, and finally dies away in famine by his sole reliance on destiny. (Hence fate = fat and faut (in Arabic), is synonymous with death).
26. It is quite certain that whatever is destined, must surely come to pass of its own accord; and that it is impossible to prevent it by the foresight of gods and men.
27. Yet the intelligent ought not cease to exert their activity, by relying in their fates only; for they must know that it is our exertion that brings destiny into action. (Because it is, destined, that destiny requires to be enforced by human exertion, in order to bring on its effect. It is operation which enforces the law, which is otherwise dormant and a dead letter).
28. Destiny is inactive and abortive, without an active power to enforce it to action; it is human activity, that is productive of any effect or production in nature by the help of destiny.
29. Depend on destiny, and remain both deaf and dumb as a doll; be inactive, and become dull and torpid as a block. Say, what is the good of this vital breath, unless it has its vitality and activity? (Destiny has destined man to exertion in order to produce the destined end; and has so ordained all animated nature, in order to be productive).
30. It is good to sit quiet; by restraining even the vital breath in Yoga meditation; whereby one can obtain his liberation: otherwise the inactive man is not to be called a Yogi, but an idler and a lazzarone.
31. Both activity and inactivity are good for our liberation from pain; but the high minded esteem that as better, which saves them from the greater pain of regeneration, (i.e. the hybernation of Yoga meditation). [3]

213321 32. This inactive destiny is a type of the latent Brahmá; and who so 213322 leans to it by laying aside his busy course, is verily installed in the 213323 supremely holy state of highest felicity (as in _ecstasis_ and 213324 hypnotism).

213325
213326 33. The inert destiny resides every where in the manner of Brahma—the 213327 latent soul in all bodies, and evolves itself in various shapes, by 213328 means of activity in all its productions.
213329

213330 CHAPTER LXIII.

213331 IMMUTABILITY OF THE DIVINE MIND.

213332
213333
213334
213335
213336
213337
213338 Argument. Expansion of the Divine Spirit, and its apparent variations
213339 in Nature.

213340
213341
213342 Vasishtha continued:—The essence of Brahma is all in all, and 213343 ever remains in every manner in every thing in all places. It is 213344 omnipotence, omniform and the lord God of all.
213345

213346 (This is the _to pan_ of Pantheism, that, God is All and All is God; 213347 that God and nature are one substance, and all its various 213348 modifications. (This is the doctrine of Vedánta, Plato and Plotinus, and 213349 lately of Sufism and German philosophy)).
213350

213351 2. This Essence is the Spirit or Soul, whose omnipotence develops itself 213352 sometimes in the form of intellectual activity, and sometimes in the 213353 tranquility of soul. Sometimes it shows itself in the _momentum_ of 213354 bodies, and at others in the force of the passions and emotions of the 213355 soul. Sometimes as something in the form of creation, and at another as 213356 nothing in the annihilation of the world. (This is the _to on_ onton—the 213357 All of all; the eternal source of all existence; the Subjective as well 213358 as Objective both together).
213359

213360 3. Whenever it realises itself any where in any form or state, it is 213361 then viewed in the same manner at the same place and time. (The spirit 213362 realises itself in one form or other of its own free Will).
213363

213364 4. The absolute Omnipotence manifests itself as it likes and appears to 213365 us; and all its powers are exhibited in one form or other to our view 213366 and understandings.
213367

213368 5. These powers are of many kinds, and are primarily concentrated in the 213369 Divine Soul or Spirit. The potentialities (or _potes esse_) are the 213370 Active and Passive powers, also the Rational and Irrational and all 213371 others.
213372

213373 6. These varieties of powers are the inventions of the learned for their 213374 own purpose and understanding; but there is no distinction of them in 213375 the Divine Spirit. (All diversities are one and the same to the unity of 213376 God (_omne ens—to en—est unum._ And again, _Qua ens est indivisum in se, 213377 divisum ab omnia alio_)).
213378

213379 7. There is no duality in reality, the difference consists in shape and 213380 not in substantiality. Thus the waves in the waters of the sea, the 213381 bracelets and wristlets formed of gold, are no more than modifications
213382 of the same substances.
213383

213384 (All formal differences terminate in the material, and this again in the 213385 immaterial Spirit of God).
213386

213387 8. The form of a thing is said to be so and so, from its appearance only 213388 and not in its reality. The snake is affirmed of a rope, but we have neither the outward perception nor inward thought of a snake in it.

Hence all appearances are delusions of sense.

9. It is the universal soul that shows itself in some form or other, to our deluded senses and understandings, and this also according to our different apprehensions of the same thing (as what appears as gold to one, seems as brass to another).

10. It is the ignorant only that understand the Omniiform God, to be all forms of things; while the learned know the forms to be modifications of the various powers of the Almighty, and not the figures themselves.

11. Now whether the forms (of material things) be real or unreal, it is to be known that they appear to men according to their different apprehensions of those beings, which Brahma is pleased to exhibit in any particular form to their minds and senses. (_i.e._ Some taking an abstract and others a concrete view of them, agreeably to their internal conceptions or external perceptions, of their various properties and qualities).

CHAPTER LXIV.

THE GERMINATING SEED.

Vasishtha resumed:—The supreme Deity is the all-pervading spirit and the great God and Lord of all. He is without beginning and end, and is self-same with the infinite bliss of his translucent self-cogitation.

2. It is this supreme felicity and purely intellectual substance, whence the living soul and mind have their rise, prior to their production of the Universe. (_i.e._ The eternal and inert bliss called Brahma, became the living soul—anima, of and the active mind—mens, which created the world).

3. Ráma asked:—How could the self-cogitation of Brahma, as the infinite spirit and one without a second, conceive in it a finite living soul other than itself, and which was not in Being.

(The inactive and active souls, are not the one and the same thing, nor can the immutable and infinite be changed to one of a finite and changeful nature; nor was there a secondary being co-existent with the unity of the self-existent God).

4. Vasishtha replied:—The immense and transparent Spirit of Brahma, remained in a state of _asat_—non-existence, a state of ineffable bliss as seen by the adept Yogi; but of formidable vastness as conceived by the uninitiated novice. (_i.e._ The meditation of the Infinite is a delight to the spiritualist, but it is a horror to the gross idolator, whose mind knows nothing beyond matter and material forms).

5. This state of supreme bliss, which is ever tranquil, and full with the pure essence of God, is altogether undefinable, and incomprehensible, even by the most proficient in divine knowledge. (God is unknowable, is the motto of the wise Athenians and modern Agnostics).

6. Thence sprang a power (an hypostasis) like the germ of a seed, and possessed of consciousness and energy, that is called the living and conscious soul, and which must last until its final liberation. (This is the Demiurge, an emanation from God, and the source and soul of the world).

7. The clear mirror of the mind of this being, reflected in its vast vacuous sphere, the images of innumerable worlds set above one another, like statues engraved upon it.

8. Know Ráma! the living soul to be an inflation of Divine Spirit, like the swelling of the sea and the burning of a candle, when its flame is unshaken by the wind.

(The _psyche_ or _anima_ is the energy of the universal soul, or the finite rising from the Infinite).

9. The living soul is possessed of a finite cognoscence as distinguished from the clear and calm consciousness of the Divine Spirit. Its vitality is a flash of the vacuous intellect of Brahma and appertaining to the nature of the living God. _Divina particula auae._ The Lord says: '_Aham asmi_—I am that I am'; but the living soul knows itself to be '_Soham asmi_'—I am He or of Him.

10. Vitality is the essential property of the soul, resembling the inseparable properties of motion in the wind, warmth in the fire and coldness in the ice. (Animation is the natural faculty and necessary property of the soul).

11. Our ignorance of the nature of the Divine Intellect and Spirit, throws us to the knowledge of ourselves by our self-consciousness, and this it is, which is called the living soul.

(Beyond our conscious or subjective knowledge of ourselves, we know nothing of the subjectivity of God, nor are we certain of any objective reality).

12. It is by means of this positive consciousness, that we know our egoism or self-existence; it strikes us more glaringly than a spark of fire, and enlightens us to the knowledge of ourselves more than any other light.

(Our self-consciousness is the clearest of all knowledge, and the basis of all truth according to Descartes).

13. As in looking up to heaven, its blue vault is presented to the sight, beyond which our eyes have not the power to pierce; so in our inquiry into the nature of soul, we see no more than the consciousness of ourselves, and nothing besides. (_i.e._ The subjective soul only is knowable, and naught beyond it).

14. Our knowledge of the soul presents to us in the form of _Ego_ known by its thoughts, like the vacuous sky appearing as a blue sphere by cause of the clouds. (The Ego is the subject of thoughts and self-cogitation).

15. Egoism differentiates the soul from our ideas of space and time, and stirs within it like the breath of winds, by reason of its subjectivity of thoughts. (Differentiation of the subjective Ego from the Objective space and time, is as the difference of Ego and Non-Ego, I and Not I, _Le moi et non moi_, _Das Ich und nicht ich_, _Aham and twam &c._).

16. That which is the subject of thoughts, is known as the Ego, and is variously styled as the intellect, the soul, the mind, the _máya_ or delusion and _Prakriti_ or nature. (The Ego personified is Rudra, the personification of _chitta_—cogitation is Vishnu, of _Jíva_ or the soul is _Brahmá_, and of the _manas_ or mind is the _máya_ or Illusion).

17. The mind (_chetas_) which is the subject of thoughts, contemplates on the nature of elementary matter, and thus becomes of itself the quintessence of the five elements.

(The mind is opposed to matter, but being the principle of volition produces matter at its will).

18. The quintessential mind next becomes as a spark of fire (of itself), and remains as a dim star—a nebula, in the midst of the vacuity of the yet unborn universe.

(The nebulae are the primary formations of heavenly bodies, called Brahmándas or mundane eggs).

19. The mind takes the form of a spark of fire by thinking on its essence, which gradually developes itself like the germ of a seed, in the form of the mundane egg by its internal force.

(The doctrine of evolution from fire, the _arche_ of all things according to Heraclitus. Lewé's Hist. Ph. I 72).

20. The same fiery spark figuratively called the Brahmánda or mundane egg, became as a snowball amidst the water, and conceived the great Brahmá within its hollow womb.

(The Spirit of God, dove-like, sat brooding over the hollow deep. Milton).

21. Then as sensuous spirits assume some bodily forms at pleasure, although they dissolve as a magic city in empty air; so this Brahmá appeared in an embodied form to view. (Spirits are at liberty to take upon them any form they like).

22. Some of them appear in the form of immovable, and others in those of moving beings; while others assume the shapes of aerials, as they are fond of choosing for themselves. (Hence the transmigration of souls in different bodies, depends on their own choice; and not on necessity or result of prior acts).

23. Thus the first born living being had a form, for himself as he liked in the beginning of creation, and afterwards created the world in his form of Brahma or Virinchi (Vir-incipiens). (The Demiurge, maker, creator or architect of the visible world, had necessarily a personality of his own).

24. Whatever the self-born and self-willed soul, wishes to produce, the same appears immediately to view as produced of its own accord. (Everything appeared of itself at the Fiat of God).

25. Brahmá, originating in the Divine Intellect, was by his nature the primary cause of all, without any cause of his own; though he appointed the acts of men; to be the cause of their transition from one state to another, in the course of the world.

(All the future states of beings depend on their acts of past and present lives, except that of the Great creator who is uncreated and unchangeable).

26. The thoughts naturally rise in the mind, like the foaming water, to subside in itself; but the acts done thereby, bind us, as the passing froth and flying birds are caught by ropes and snares.

(The thoughts are spontaneous in their growth as grass, and they entail no guilt on us. Shakespeare).

27. Thoughts are the seeds of action, and action is the soul of life. Past acts are productive of future consequence, but inaction is attended with no result. (Our lives are reckoned by our acts, and there is no vitality without activity).

28. The living soul bears its vitality as the seed bears the germ in its bosom; and this sprouts forth in future acts, in the manner of the various forms of leaves, fruits and flowers of trees.

(Thus the living soul of Brahmá was the seed of all animate and inanimate beings).

29. All other living souls that appeared in the various forms of their bodies, had such forms given to them by Brahmá, according to their acts and desires in premundane creations in former Kalpas. (Hence the belief in the endless succession of creations).

30. So the personal acts of people are the causes of their repeated births and deaths in this or other worlds; and they ascend higher or sink lower by virtue of their good or bad deeds, which proceed from their hearts and the nature of their souls.

31. Our actions are the efforts of our minds, and shape our good or bad destinies according to the merit or demerit of the acts. The fates and chances of all in the existing world, are the fruits and flowers of their past acts, and even of those done in prior Kalpas; and this is called their destiny. (Śāstra: No act goes for naught even in a thousand _Kalpas_. Má bhuktan kshiyate Karma, kalpa koti satai rapi).

CHAPTER LXV.

NATURE OF THE LIVING SOUL.

Argument. The mind and its operations, the subjective and objective, and lastly the Divine Intellect.

Vasishtha continued:—The Mind sprang at first from the supreme cause of all; this mind is the active soul which resides in the supreme soul (the Ens entium).

2. The mind hangs in doubt between what is and what is not, and what is right and what is wrong. It forgets the past like the scent of a fleeting odor by its wilful negligence. (Unmindfulness is the cause of forgetfulness).

3. Yet there is no difference between these seeming contraries; because the dualities of Brahma and the soul, the mind and máyá, the agent and act, and the phenomenal and noumenal worlds, all blend together in the unity of God. (All seeming differences converge in unvarying Mind).

4. There is but one Universal soul displaying its Intellect as a vast ocean, and extending its consciousness as a sea of unlimited extent. (These extend to all beings in the universe).

5. What is true and real shines forth amidst all that is untrue and unreal; so does the subjective essence of the mind subsist amidst all its airy and fleeting dreams in sleep. And thus the world is both true and untrue as regards its subsistence in God and its external phenomena. (The substance is real but the appearance is false).

6. The erroneous conception either of the reality or unreality of the outer world, does not spring in the mind, which is conscious of its operations only, and of no outward phenomena. This conception is like the deception of a magic show, and is concomitant with all sensuous minds.

7. It is the long habit of thinking the unreal world as real, that makes it appear as such, to the unthinking, as a protracted sleep makes its visionary scenes appear as true to the dreaming soul. It is the want of reflection, that causes us to mistake a man in a block of wood.

8. Want of spiritual light misleads the mind from its rationality, and makes it take its false imaginations for true; as children are impressed with a belief of ghosts in shadows, through their fear and want of true knowledge.

9. The mind is inclined of its own tendency, to assign a living soul (and also a body) to the Divine Spirit; which is devoid of appellation, form or figure, and is beyond our comprehension; (and is styled the Incomprehensible).

10. Knowledge of the living state (personality), leads to that of Egoism which is the cause of intellection. This again introduces the sensations and finally the sensible body. (Ego is the subject of thoughts).

11. This bondage of the soul in body, necessitates a heaven and hell for want of its liberation and then the acts of the body, become the seeds of our endless transmigrations in this world.

12. As there is no difference between the soul, intellect and life, so there is no duality in the living soul and intellect, nor in the body and its acts, which are inseparable from each other.

13. Acts are the causes of bodies, and the body is not the mind; the mind is one with egoism, and the ego is the living soul. The living soul is one with the Divine Intellect and this soul is all and the lord God of all.

CHAPTER LXVI.

MEDITATION OF THE SUBJECTIVE AND OBJECTIVE.

Argument. Origin and Nature of Duality and the Manner of its Extinction.

Thus Râma! there is one true essence, which appears many by our mistake; and this variety is caused by the production of one from the other, as one lamp is lighted from another.

2. By knowing one's self as nothing as it was before its coming to being, and by considering the falsity of his notions (of his reality), no one can have any cause of grief (at its loss). (The Sruti:—The knower of the true-self, is above all grief and sorrow).

3. Man is but a being of his own conception, and by getting rid of this concept, he is freed from his idea of the duality of the world (as a distinct existence); just as one with his shoes on, perceives the whole earth he treads upon, to be covered over with skin.

4. As the plantain tree has no pith except its manifold coats, so there is no substantiality of the world beside our false conceptions of it.

5. Our births are followed by childhood, youth, old age and death one after the other, and then opens the prospect of a heaven or hell to our view, like passing phantoms before the flighty mind.

6. As the clear eye sees bubbles of light in the empty sky, so the thoughtless mind views the firmament full of luminous bodies (which are but phantoms of the brain).

7. As the one moon appears as two to the dimsighted eye, so the intellect, vitiated by influence of the senses, sees a duality in the unity of the supreme spirit.

8. As the giddiness of wine presents the pictures of trees before the drunken eye, so does the inebriation of sensation, present the phantoms of the world before the excited intellect.

9. Know the revolution of the visible world, to resemble the revolving wheel of a potter's mill; which they turn about in play as the rotatory ball of a terrestrial globe.

10. When the intellect thinks of another thing (as matter) beside itself, it then falls into the error of dualism; but when it concentrates its thoughts in itself, it then loses the sense of the objective duality.

11. There is nothing beside the Intellect except the thoughts on which it dwells; and its sensations are all at rest, as it comes to know the nihility of objects.

12. When the weak intellect is quiet by its union with the Supreme, and by suppression of its functions, it is then called sansánta—or quiescent or insouciant.

13. It is the weak intellect that thinks of the thinkables, but the sound understanding ceases from all thoughts; as it is a slight intoxication that makes one rave and revel about, while deep drinking is dead to all excitements.

14. When the sound and consummate understanding, runs in one course towards its main reservoir of the supreme; it becomes divested of its knowledge of the knowables, and of its self-consciousness also in the presence of the one and no other.

15. The perfected understanding finds the errors, to which it is exposed by its sensation of the sensibles; and comes to know, that birth and life and all the acts and sights of the living state, are as false as dreams.

16. The mind being repressed from its natural flight, can have no thought of any thing; and is lost in itself; as the natural heat of fire and motion of the wind being extinct, they are annihilated of themselves.

17. Without the suppression of mental operations, the mind must continue in its misconceptions, as that of mistaking a rope for a snake through ignorance.

18. It is not difficult to repress the action of the mind and rouse our consciousness; in order to heal our souls of the malady of their mistaken notion of the world.

19. If you can succeed to suppress the desires of your restless mind at any time, you are sure to obtain your liberation even at the very moment and without fail.

20. If you will but turn to the side of your subjective consciousness only, you will get rid of the objective world, in the same manner as one is freed from his fear of snake in a rope, by his examination of the thing.

21. If it is possible to get rid of the restless mind, which is the source of all our desires; it is no way impossible to attain to the chief end of liberation to any.

22. When highminded men are seen to give up their lives as straws (in an honorable cause), there is no reason why they should be reluctant to abandon their desires for the sake of their chief good of liberation.

23. Remain unfettered by forsaking the desires of your greedy mind; for what is the good of getting sensible objects, which we are sure to lose (some time or other).

24. The liberated are already in the sight of the immortality of their souls and of God, as one who has got a fruit in his hand, or sees a mountain palpable before him.

25. It is the Spirit of God alone, that abides in everything in these phenomenal worlds, which rise to view like the waves of the waters of the great deluge. It is his knowledge that is attended with the sumnum bonum of liberation, and it is ignorance of that supreme Being, that binds the mind to the interminable bondage of the world.

CHAPTER LXVII.

LECTURE ON TRUTH.

Argument. Nature of the Active and Living Soul (Jíva) and its Sensations.

Ráma said:—Leaving the mind please tell me more about the nature of the living soul; what relation it bears to the Supreme soul, how it sprang from the same and what is its essence.

2. Vasishtha replied:—Know Brahma is omnipresent, and the Lord of all at all times; He manifests himself in whatever attribute he assumes to himself at his free will. Ex arbitrio suo.

3. The attribute which the universal soul assumes to itself in the form of perception (chétana), is known by the term living soul, which possesses the power of volition in itself.

4. There are two causal principles combined with the living soul, namely: its predestination resulting from its prior acts and volitions; and its later free will which branch forth severally into the various causes of birth, death and subsistence of beings.

5. Ráma said:—Such being the case, tell me, O thou greatest of sages, what this predestination means and what are these acts, and how they become the causal agents of subsequent events.

6. Vasishtha replied:—The intellect (chit) is possest of its own nature of the properties of oscillation and rest, like the vacillation and stillness of the winds in the air. Its agitation is the cause of its action, otherwise it is calm and quiet as a dead lock—quietus itself.

7. Its oscillation appears in the fluctuation of the mind, and its calmness in the want of mental activity and exertions; as in the nonchalance of Yoga quietism.

8. The vibrations of the intellect lead to its continual transmigrations; and its quietness settles it in the state of the immovable Brahma. The oscillation of the intellect is known to be the cause of the living state and all its actions.

(The moving force of the mind is the animism of Stahl, and its rest is the quietus of Plato).

9. This vibrative intellect is the thinking Soul, and is known as the living agent of actions; and the primary seed of the universe. (This is the anima mundi or moving force of the world,—the doctrine of Stahl).

10. This secondary soul then assumes a luminous form according to the light of its intellect, and afterwards becomes multifarious at its will, and by means of the pulsations of the primary intellect all over the creation. (This luminous form is represented by the red body of Brahma and the red clay of which Adam was formed. (It was the All—to pan_ of Pantheism, and the Principium hylarchicum or first principle of Henry Moore)).

11. The pulsative intellect or soul, having passed through many transformations (or transmigrations), is at last freed from its motion and migration. And there are some souls which pass into a thousand births and forms, while there are others which obtain their liberation in a single birth (by means of their Yoga meditation or unification with God, which is the final aim of Platonism and of the Chinese Laosin).

12. So also the human soul being of its own nature prone to assume its dualism of the motive intellect, becomes by itself the cause of its transmigration and sufferings, as also of its transient bliss or misery in heaven or hell. (There is no rest for the restless soul, until it rests in the bosom of the all-tranquil and Universal soul).
13. As the same gold is changed to the forms of bracelets and other things, and as the same gross matter appears in the different forms of wood and stone; so the uniform soul of God appears as multiform according to his various modes and attributes. (The soul modifies itself into many forms of activity and passivity).
14. It is the fallacy of the human mind, that views the forms as realities, and causes one to think his soul which is freed from birth and form, to be born, living and dead, as a man sees a city to rise and fall in his delirium. (The appearances and forms of things are objective and false fabrications of the intellect).
15. The varying intellect erroneously conceives its unreal egoism and meitatem as realities, from its ignorance of its unity with the unchangeable reality of God, and also from its felicity of enjoyments peculiar to its varied state. (The भोगशा or desire of fruition is the cause of the revolution of the soul in endless states of beings).
16. As Lavana the King of Mathura, falsely deemed himself as a Chandála, so the intellect thinks on its own different states of existence and that of the world (from its desire of enjoying its pleasures which are deeply rooted in itself).
17. All this world is the phantom of an erroneous imagination, O Ráma! it is no more than the swelling of the waters of the deep. (The world is the expansion of the self-same soul and its evolution is the volition of Brahma).
18. The intellect is ever busied with the intellection of its own intelligences, and the innate principles of its action; in the same manner as the sea is seen to swell with its waters moving in waves of themselves. (The continuation of the intellect in the association of its preconceived ideas, is carried on by law of continuity).
19. The intellect is as the water in the wide expanse of Brahma; its inflation raises the waving thoughts in the mind, resembling the bubbles of water, and produces the revolutions of living souls like eddies in the sea of this world.
20. Know thy soul, O gentle Ráma! as a phenomenon of the all pervading Brahma, who is both the subject and object of his consciousness, and who has posited in thee a particle of himself, like the breath of a mighty lion.
21. The intellect with its consciousness, constitutes the living soul, and that with the will forms the mind; its knowing power is the understanding, and its retentiveness is called its memory: its subjectivity of selfishness is styled egoism, and its error is called máyá or delusion. (Consciousness is perception qua mens de presenti suo statu admonitur. The living soul is psyche or animus. The intellect is the mover of the will. The intellectus est prior voluntate, non enim est voluntas &c. The understanding has the power to acquire knowledge, and memory has the power of retention &c.).
22. The mind by its imagination stretches out this world, which is as false as the phantom of Utopia—Gandharva-nagaram or an air drawn city.
23. The objective knowledge of the world in the mind, is as false as the appearance of chains of pearls in the sky, and as the visionary scenes in a dream. (The objective is the feigned fabrication of the mind, and therefore unreal).

24. The soul which is ever pure and self sufficient in its nature, and remains in its own state of tranquility; is not perceived by the perverted mind dwelling on its delusive dreams.

25. The objective world is referred to waking-Jágrat, because it is perceived in the waking state of the soul; and the subjective mind is allied to sleep-swapna_, because the mind is active during the sleeping and dreaming states. The ego is related to deep sleep-sushupta_, when we are unconscious of ourselves, and the fourth or pure Intellect-turiya_ or turya_, is the trance or hybernation of the soul.

26. That which is above these four conditions, is the state of ultimate bliss, _ecstasis_; and it is by reliance on that supremely pure essence of God, that one is exempted from all his causes of grief and sorrow (in his ecstatic delight).

27. Everything is displayed in Him and all things are absorbed in Him also; this world is neither a reality here or there; it presents only the false appearance of strings of pearls in the sky. (Sensible forms are empty appearances, and are only believed as real by materialists).

28. And yet God is said to be the cause and substratum, of all these unobstructed phantoms rising to the view, as the empty air is said to be the receptacle of the rising trees. Thus the uncausal God is said to be the cause of this uncaused world, which only exists in our illusive conceptions, and presents itself to our delusive sensations of it.

29. As a polished piece of iron gets the reflexion of a grosser piece, so do our finer or inner sensations take the representations of the gross forms of their particular objects (though the senses and sensible objects are both untrue, as mere delusive and delusions).

30. These sensations are conveyed to the mind, and thence again to the living soul and intellect, in the same manner as the roots supply the sap to the stem, and thence to the branches, and lastly to the fruits of trees. (_i.e._ The Divine Intellect is the last receptacle of the impressions of the senses).

31. As the seed produces the fruit, and the same contains the seed in itself; so the intellect producing the mind and its thoughts can not get rid of them; but is contained in, and reproduced by them in successive transmigrations.

32. There is some difference however in the simile of the insensible seed and tree; with the sensible intellect and mind (which are freed from reproduction by their attainment of liberation); but the thoughts of the creator and creation like the seed and tree, are reproductive of one another without end. (Because the thought of the creator accompanies that of the creation, and so the _viceversa_; owing to the unbroken chain and interminable concatenation of the ideas of causality and its effect).

33. But there is this difference between the insensible seed and sensible intellect, that the former is continually productive of one another, while the latter ceases in its process upon its attainment of liberation; yet the ideas of the creator and creation are reproductive of each other _adinfinitum_.

34. Yet our understanding shows it as clearly-as the sun light sets forth the forms and colours of objects to view; that there is one eternal God of truth, who is of the form of intellectual light, which shows the forms of all things, that proceed from Him (as the colours of objects originate from the solar light, and are shown again by the same to our optical vision).

35. As the ground which is dug presents a hollow, so the reasoning of every system of sound philosophy establishes the existence of the transcendental void as the cause of all. (An unknown first cause without any attribute, is the unanimous conclusion, arrived at every rational system of Philosophy. See Kusumánjali. Here Vasishtha establishes his vacuous rather than a personal cause).

36. As a prismatic crystal represents various colours in its prisms, without being tinged by the same; so the transparent essence of Brahma shows the groups of worlds in its hollow bosom without its connection with them. (This variety of vision is caused by our optical deception).

37. The universal soul is the source, and not the substance of all these vast masses of worlds; just as the seed is the embryo, and not the matter of the trees and plants and their fruits and flowers that grow from the same. (The to on is the only principle called God, all other objects are but phenomenal modifications of his essence).

38. Ráma said:—Oh how wonderful is this world, which presents its unreality as a reality in all its endless forms unto us; and though situated in the Divine self, appears to be quite apart from it. O how it makes its minuteness seem so very immense to us. (What are these worlds but as particles subsisting in the divine essence, when they are compared with the immensity of the Divine spirit and mind—the finite with the Infinite).

39. I see how this shadowy scene of the world appearing in the Divine soul, and becoming as an orb, by virtue of the ideal tanmátras or particles of the divine essence in it. I find it as a snow ball or icicle made of frozen frost.

40. Now tell me Sir, how the spiritual particles increase in bulk, and in what manner the body of the self born Brahmá was produced from Brahma. Say also in what manner do these objects in nature come to existence in their material forms.

(Brahmá the Demiurgus was an emanation of God according to Gnostics; and Vaishvánara was the same as the soul of the world according to Plotinus).

41. Vasishtha replied:—Too incredible is this form and without a parallel, which sprang of itself from its own essence. It is altogether inconceivable how some thing is produced of its own conception.

42. Just fancy, O Ráma! how the unexpanded phantom of a Vetála or ghost, swells in bigness to the sight of fearful children; and conceive in the same manner the appearance of the living spirit from the entity of Brahma. (Evolution of the Living God from the inert Brahma, is as the springing of the moving spirit from the dormant soul).

43. This living spirit was a development of Brahma—the universal soul; it was holy and a commensurable and finite being, and having a personality of its own; it remained as an impersonal unreality in the essence of the selfexistent God. Being separated afterwards from its source, it had a different appellation given to it. (This is the Holy spirit or ghost in one sense, as also the Divine Logos in another, and in whom there was life).

44. As Brahma the all extended and infinite soul, became the definite living soul at will; so the living spirit, became the mind by its volition afterwards. (There is a trinity or triple division of the soul into soma or the universal soul, the pneuma or anima or the living spirit, and the nous or mens or mind).

45. The mind which was the principle of intellection, took a form of its own; and so likewise the life assumed an airy form in the midst of vacuity. (The mind is the state of the impersonal soul with a sense of its personality, and life is animation or the vital principle in the form of the vital breath).

46. The wakeful living god (who had no twinkling of his eyes), whereby we measure time was yet conscious of its course by means of his thoughts; and had the notion of a brilliant icicle of the form of the future mundane egg in his mind. See Manu's Genesis of the World. I.

47. Then the living soul felt in itself the sense of its consciousness, and by thinking 'what am I,' was conscious of its egoism. (Why is the non-ego of the objective world put before the ego? The objective orb of the world should follow the subjective consciousness).

48. This god next found in his understanding the knowledge of the word taste, and got the notion of its becoming the object of a particular organ of sense, to be hereafter called "the tongue." (Rasaná or the instrument of the perception of rasa or flavour. Rasa abiding in water is reckoned first of the elements on account the Spirit of God resting on it before creation, wherefore God is himself called rasa in the Sruti-rasa vaitat).

49. The living soul then found out in his mind the meaning of the word 'light,' which was afterwards to sparkle in the eye—the particular organ of sight.

(The Bible says, lux fiat et lux fit—Light to be the first work of creation; though the Vedas give Priority to water as in the passages "apa eva sasarjádau", Manu. Yasrishtih Srasturádya. Sakuntala).

50. Next the god came to know in his mind the property of smell, and the organ of smelling; as also the substance of earth to which it appertains as its inseparable property. (The Nyaya says: prithví gandhavatí—the earth is smelling. It followed the creation of light).

51. In this manner the living soul, came to be acquainted at once with the other sensations, and the organs to which they appertain as their inseparable properties and objects. (The word bhavitá means the spontaneous growth of these faculties in the soul or mind, and kákatáliya signifies the simultaneous occurrence of the senses, and sensible objects, and their sensations in the mind).

52. The unsubstantial living spirit which derives its being from the essence of the substantial Brahma, comes next to acquire the knowledge of sound, the object of the organ of hearing, and the property of air. (So Nyaya:—" ákásh sabdádharah"; and "yá Sruti visaya gunáh"—Sakuntala).

53. It then comes to understand the meaning of the word touch (twak) as the medium of feeling, as also to know the tongue as the only organ of taste. (According to schoolmen, taste is the object of the palate and not of the tongue).

53. It finds the property of colour to be the peculiar object of the eye—the organ of sight; and that of smell to be an object peculiar to the nose—the organ of the sense of smelling (ghránendriya).

54. The living soul is thus the common receptacle of the sensations, and source of the senses, which it develops afterwards in the organs of sense in the body. It perceives the sensation of sensible objects through the perceptive holes, that convey their perceptions into the sensorium of the mind. (The common sensory is variously placed in Western philosophy, such as the heart, brain, pineal gland, the ventricularis &c.).

55. Such, O Ráma! as it was with the first animated being, is still so with all living animals; and all these sensations are represented in the Soul of the world—anima mundi, in its spiritual form—átiváhika, known as the súkshma or lingadeha—the subtle body. (The spiritual body has 17 organs of sense viz, 5 Internal, 5 External, the mind and Intellect and others (called the saptadasha lingátmaka linga saríra)).

56. The nature of this abstruse essence, is as undefinable as that of the spirit; it appears to be in motion, when it is really at rest, as in our idea of the soul. (Spiritual bodies are said to move and fly about, because the spirit is the motive, and life the animating principle as the soul is that of consciousness).

57. As measure and dimensions are foreign, to our notion of Brahma—the all conscious soul, so are they quite apart from that of the spirit also, which is no more than the motive power of the soul. (Magnitude, figure, motion, rest, number, place, distance, position, &c. are all objects of the senses).

58. As the notion of the spiritual, is distinct from that of all others which are material and corporeal; so the notion of Brahma is quite apart from every thing, except that of his self-consciousness.

(God says in the Scripture, "I am that I am," which proves his consciousness of himself to constitute his essence).

59. Ráma said:—If consciousness is self-same with Brahma, and our consciousness of ourselves as Brahma, make us identic with Brahma Himself; then what is the use of devising a duality of the soul (as the divine and human souls), or of talking of the liberation and final absorption of the one in the other? (If what the Sruti says, Brahmásmi—I am Brahma; as the scripture declares—"In Him we live and move," then what means our redemption or return to Him?).

60. Vasishtha replied:—Ráma, your question is irrelevant at this time, when I was going to prove another thing. Nothing can be appropriate out of its proper time and place, as the untimely offering of flowers to gods is not acceptable to them. (A question beside the mark is _apropos de bottes_, and brought in by the head and shoulders).

61. A word full of meaning, becomes meaningless out of its proper place; like the offering of flowers to gods and guests, out of their proper season. (So all intempestivous acts, go _mal a propos_, unless they are done in proper time).

62. There is a time for the introducing of a subject, and another to hold silence over it; so every thing becomes fruitful in its proper season. (Tempus coronat opus).

63. But to resume our subject; the living soul afterwards appeared from Him, as the human soul appears in dreaming; and thought in himself that he was the great father of created beings in time to come. (_i.e._ He would become the Maker of the world).

64. He uttered the syllable Om (on or ens), and was conscious of the verification of its meaning in his mind, which soon displayed all forms of beings to his mental vision. (_i.e._ The All One became many, which displayed themselves in the mind of the living God as visions in a dream).

65. All these were unrealities, that were displayed in the empty sphere of the divine mind; and the shadowy world seemed as a huge mountain, floating before him in the air.

66. It was neither born of itself, nor was made by Brahmá; nor is it destroyed at any time by any other power. It was Brahma himself, appearing as the phantom of an aerial city.

67. As the living Brahmá and other spiritual beings, are unreal in their nature; so also are the essences of other beings, from the big giant to the little emmet, but mere unrealities in their substance.

68. It is our erroneous understanding, that represents these unrealities as real ones unto us; but the clear understanding will find all things, from the great Brahmá down to the minutest insect, to vanish entirely from its sight. (Errors of the mind breed errors in the brain; and these lead to errors of vision again).

69. The same cause that produces Brahmá, produces the insects also; and it is the greater depravity of the mind, that causes its transmigration, into the contemptible forms of worms.

70. The living being that is possest of a rational soul, and is devoted to the cultivation of the mind, attains to the state of man; and then acts righteously for attaining a better state in after life. (These are the states of gods and angels in heaven).

71. It is wrong to suppose one's elevation, to be owing to the merit of his acts, and his degradation to the condition of worms, to result from his former acts of demerit; because there is the same particle of intellect in both of them, and this being known, will destroy the mistaken difference between the great and small.

72. The notions of the measurer, measure and measurable, are not separate from the intellect (or mind); therefore the controversy of unity and duality, is as futile as the horns of a hare or a lake of lotuses in the air. (This means the ideas of the producer, production and product, are always one in the Absolute subjective. Schelling).

73. It is our misconception of the blissful Brahma, that produces the wrong notion of solid substances in us; and this imagination of our own making, binds us as fast as the silk-worms are fast bound in the cocoons; formed by their own serum (or ichor or serosity).

74. It is the case of the knower, to perceive everything in his mind, as it is revealed in it by Brahma; and also to meet with every thing as it is allotted by God to his share. (God is the revealer and giver of all things. Or-Man meets his fate, as it is meted to him by his Maker).

75. It is the immutable law of nature, that nothing can be otherwise than what it is ordained to be; and there is nothing in nature, which can change its nature for a minute in a whole kalpa-age. (Nature derives her power from the will of her Maker, and her course is, according to the immutable order, fixed by the ordainer of all).

76. And yet this creation is a false phantom, and so is the growth and dissolution of all created beings, as also our enjoyment of them. (All visible Nature is the working of the invisible Spirit).

77. Brahma is pure, all pervading, infinite and absolute. It is for our misery only, that we take him for the impure matter and unreal substance; and as the definite and limited pluralities.

78. It is the vitiated imagination of boys, that fancies the water and its waves as different things; and makes a false distinction between them which are really the same things. (Hence whatever differences there appear in objects, they are all as the fallacy of a snake in the rope with the unknowing. There is no difference of antagonistic powers felt in the spirit of Brahma, who is equal in all, and to whom all things are equal; though there seems a constant opposition in the natures of things).

79. It is His undivided self which expanded itself in visible nature, and which appears as a duality, like that of the waves and the sea, and the bracelets and gold. Thus He of himself appears as other than himself. (_i.e._ The difference appearing in the visibles, disappears in the indifference of the Divine Mind).

80. We are led to imagine the visible and mutable world, to have sprung from the invisible and immutable spirit, which manifested itself in the form of the mind that produced the Ego. Thus we have the visible from the invisible, and the mind and the ego from the same source. (The absolute Brahma manifesting itself in two forms, the mind or ego and nature or non-ego. The Ego of the mind is infinite, which produced the finite ego or human soul, personified as the first male (Adimapurusha or Adam)).

81. The mind joined with the ego, produced the notions of elementary principles or elemental particles; which the living soul combined with its intellect, derived from the main source of Brahma, and of which it formed the phenomenal world. (These notions were the intensive concepts of the formal and reflexive world, existing primordially in the essence of Brahma, as its material cause or (upádánam). So says the Vedánta:—Yato viswamvá imámi bhutani &c.).

82. Thus the mind being realised from Brahma, sees before it whatever it imagines; and whatever the intellect thinks upon, whether it is a reality or unreality, the same comes to take place. The reflexion verily passes into reality. (The imagination is the faculty representative of the phenomena of internal and external worlds. It is both productive and reproductive. Sir Wm. Hamilton. Here intellect means the Supreme Intellect, the wisdom of God and his design in the works of creation. All beings and things are manifestations of one Eternal and original mind God).

CHAPTER LXVIII.

DESCRIPTION OF A RÁKSHASÍ (OR FEMALE FIEND).[4]

Argument. Story of Karkatí the female fiend, and her austerities for extirpation of Human Kind.

Vasishtha said:—Hear me relate to you, Ráma! an old anecdote bearing upon this subject, and relating to a difficult proposition adduced by the Rákshashí for solution.

2. There lived on the north of Himálaya a heinous Rákshashí, by name of Karkatí—a crooked crab; who was as dark as ink and stalwart as a rock, with limbs as strong as could split the sturdy oak.

3. She was also known by the title of Visúchí or cholic pain, by which she was ever afflicted, and which had reduced her frame like that of the Vindhya hill, which was cowered down (by the curse of Agastya).

4. Her eye-balls were as blazing as fires; and her stature reaching half way to the sky, was girt by a blue garment, like the shade of night wrapping the atmosphere.

5. A white mantle formed the covering of her head, like the fragment of a cloud; and the long erect hairs of her head, stood like a sable cloud on her crest.

6. Her eyes flashed as lightnings, and her sharp hooked nails glistened as sapphires; her legs were as long as tamála trees, and her loud laughter was as a burst of frost.

7. A string of dried bones decorated her body, like a wreath of flowers; and the relics of dead bodies, adorned every part of her body.

8. She frolicked in the company of Vetálas, with human skulls hanging down her ears as ear-rings; and stretched out her arms aloft, as if she was going to pluck the sun from his sphere.

9. Her huge body being in want of its necessary aliment, caused her culinary fire to blaze like the submarine flame, which the waters of the deep are unable to quench. (The latent heat in water).

10. Nothing could ever satiate the insatiable hunger, of this big bellied monster; nor satisfy her lickerish tongue, which was always stretched out like a flame of fire.

11. She thought in herself saying:—Oh! if I could but once go to the Jambudwīpa—the land of Asia, I would devour all its men in one swoop, and feast on them continually, like the submarine fire upon the waters.

12. As the clouds cool the burning sands by their rain, so will I allay the burning fire of my hunger there. It is settled as the best plan to support my life, at this critical moment.

13. All men are well guarded by means of their mantras, medicines, austerities, devotions and charities, from all evils of the world; whence it is impossible for any body to destroy the indestructible devotee. (My all destructive devotion will destroy all; but render me indestructible).

14. I will perform the most rigorous austerities, with an unflinching heart and mind; because it is by intensity of painstaking, that we may gain what is otherwise hard to be had. (Industria vincit omnia.—Labour conquers all).

15. Having thought so, she repaired to an inaccessible mountain, for the purpose of destroying all animal beings. (The Rákshasa cannibals are devourers of all flesh; and are of the omnivorous kind).

16. She climbed to the top of the mountain, by scrambling over it with her hands and feet; and stood on it with her body resembling a cloud, and her eye-balls flashing as lightnings. (i.e. Her body and eyesight, were similar to the cloud and lightning on the mountain top).

17. Having got to the summit, she made her ablution and then sat at her devotion; with her steadfast eyeballs resembling the two orbs of the sun and moon, and fixed on one object.

18. She passed there many a day and month, and saw the course of many a season and year. She exposed her huge body to the rigor of heat and cold, like the hill itself (on which she sat).

19. She with her huge black body, remained unmoved as a thick sable cloud, on the mountain top; and her jet black hairs stood up as if to touch the sky.

20. Seeing her body beaten by the blasts, and covered with nothing but her ragged skin; and her hairs standing up to their end, to be tossed to and fro by the raging winds; while the twinklings of her eyelids, shed a whitish glare on her sable frame, the god Brahmá made his appearance before her.

CHAPTER LXIX.

STORY OF VISÚCHIKÁ—(continued). [5]

Argument. Brahmá's boon to Visúchí, and the mantra against her Power.

Vasishtha resumed:—After the lapse of a thousand years, Brahmá appeared to her, in order to put an end to the ardour of her austerities, and crown her with success or the reward of her devotion. (Ardent devotion has the power of displacing even the gods from their heavenly seats).

2. She saluted him internally in her mind, and remained fixed in her position; thinking about the boon she should beg of him, for allaying her keen appetite.

3. She soon recollected a certain request, which she should prefer to her complying god; and it was to transform her soft and flexible form to the shape of an inflexible iron-nail, wherewith she could torment all living beings. (i.e. To make her fleshy form as stiff as a poker, so as to be able to pierce all others without being pierced herself).

4. At Brahmá's bidding, she bethought in herself: "I will become as thin as a minute pin, in order to enter imperceptibly into the hearts of animals, as the odor of flowers enters the nostrils."

5. "By this means will I suck the heart-blood of beings, to my heart's satisfaction; in this way will my hunger be satiated, and the gratification of my appetite, will give the greatest delight to my soul."

6. As she was thinking in this manner, the God discovered her sinister motives, contrary to the character of a yogi; and accosted her in a voice resembling the roaring of clouds.

7. Brahmá said:—Daughter Karkatí, of the Rákshasa race, that sittest here like a cloud on the inaccessible top of this mountain; know that I am pleased with thy devotion, and bid thee now to raise thyself, and receive the boon that thou desirest of me.

8. Karkatí answered:—"O Lord of the past and future! If thou art inclined to grant my request, then please to confer on me the boon, of transforming my unironlike body to the form of an iron needle."

9. Vasishtha said:—The God pronounced "Be it so," and joined, "thou wilt be as a pin, and shalt be called the colic pain, for thy giving pain to all bodies."

10. "Thou shalt be the cruel cause of acute pain and pang to all living being; and particularly to the intemperate and hard-working fools, and loose libertines, who are destined to be thy devoted victims."

11. "Moreover shalt thou molest the dwellers of unhealthy districts, and the practicers of malpractices; by entering their hearts with thy infectious breath, and by disturbing their sleep, and deranging the liver and other intestinal parts of the body."

12. "Thou shalt be of the form of wind (in the bowels), and cause bile and flatulence under the different names of colic diseases, and attack the intemperate both among the wise and unwise."

13. "The wise when attacked by thee, will be healed by repeating this runic _mantra_, which I will here propound for their benefit."

14. The mantra runs thus:—"There lives Karkatí, the Rákshasí, in the north of the snowy mountain; her name is Visúchiká, and it is for repelling her power that I repeat this mantra; "Om, I bow to _hring_, hrang_ and _ring_, rang_—the powers of Vishnu, and invoke the Vaishnavi powers to remove, destroy, root out, drive away this colic pain, far beyond the Himálayas, and afar to the orb of the moon. Om, (amen) and _swáhá_ (soho), be it so." Let these lines be held on the left arm as an amulet.

15. "Then rub the painful part with the palm of that hand, and think the colic Karkatí to be crushed under the mallet of this amulet, and driven back beyond the hills with loud wailing."

16. "Let the patient think the medicinal moon to be seated in his heart, and believe himself to be freed from death and disease; and his faith will save his life and heal his pain."

17. "The attentive adept, who having purified himself with sprinkling the water in his mouth, repeats this formula, he succeeds in a short time to remove the colic pain altogether."

18. The lord of the three worlds then disappeared in the air, after delivering this efficacious amulet to the _Siddhas_ attending upon him. He went to his splendid seat in heaven, where he was received by the god Indra, who advanced to hail him with his hosannas.

CHAPTER LXX.

CONDUCT OF VISÚCHÍ, OR THE ADVENTURES OF THE NEEDLE.

Argument. The gradual leanness of _Súchí_, and her entrance in Human bodies.

Vasishtha continued:—Now this Súchí who had been as tall as a mountain-peak, and a Rákshasí of the blackest kind, resembling a thick and dark cloud of the rainy season; began gradually to fade away, and grow leaner and leaner day by day.

2. Her gigantic cloud-like form, was soon reduced to the shape of the branch of a tree, which afterwards became of the figure of a man, and then of the measure of a cubit only.

3. It next became of the length of a span in its heighth, and then of a finger's length in all. Growing by degrees thinner and thinner like a corn or grain, it became at last as lean as a needle or pin.

4. She was thus reduced to the thinness of a needle, fit only to sew a silken robe; and became as lean as the filament of the lotus flower by her own desire; which can change a hill to a grain of sand. (This passage bears reference to the microcosm of human soul).

5. The unmetallic _Súchí_, was thus transformed to the form of a black and slender iron needle; which containing all her limbs and organs of her body in it, conducted her in the air and everywhere as she liked. (Thus the gross human body being reduced to its subtle _átiváhika_ or spiritual form, it is possible for the Yogi to traverse through the air, as we perceive in the course of our minds).

6. She viewed her person as an iron pin, and having neither any substance nor length or breadth of her body. (The false idea of length and breadth of the soul is a fallacy of our understanding; because the soul like a geometrical line, has no dimension nor substance whatever in it).

7. Her mind with its power of thought, appeared as bright as a golden needle (pointing to the point); and as a streak of the sapphire impregnated by solar ray.

8. Her rolling eye-balls, were as dark as the spots of black clouds, moved to and fro by the winds; and her sparkling pupils were gazing at the bright glory (of God); piercing through their tenuous pores. (It is explained also as fixing the eye-sight to some chink (as that of a wall or other), through which the light of God enters the sensory of sight, and then penetrates into the soul as in Yoga meditation).

9. She had observed the vow of her taciturnity (mauna-vrata), for reducing the plumpness of her person, and was gladdened in her face, to become as lean as the filament of a feather. (The vow of keeping silence is said to be of great good, by increasing the power of thought; for he who speaks little thinks much, and who so talks much, must talk in vain. It is the practice of _munis_ or saints to remain silent, whence the vow has its name).

10. She beheld a light alighting on her, from the air at a distance; and she was glad in her face to find her inward spirit, to be sublimated as air. (The internal light and lightness of the body are results of _yoga_ practice).

11. With her contracted eye brows, she beheld the rays of light extending to her from afar; which caused the hairs on her body, to stand up like those of babies at bathing.

12. Her grand artery called Brahmanádí or susumna, was raised about its cavity in the head called the Brahma-randhra; in order to greet the holy light, as the filaments of the lotus, rise to receive the solar light and heat.

13. Having subdued the organs of her senses and their powers, she remained as one without her organic frame, and identified with her living soul; and resembled the intelligent principle of the Bauddhas and Tárkikas, which is unseen by others. (i.e. In her spiritual form only).

14. Her minuteness seemed to have produced the minutiae of minute philosophers, called the siddhárthas; and her silence was like that of the wind confined in a cave. Her slender form of the puny pin, resembled the breath of animal life, which is imperceptible to the eye.

15. The little that remained of her person, was as thin as the last hope of man (which sustains his life). It was as the pencil of the extinguished flame of a lamp; that has its heat without the light.

16. But alas! how pitiable was her folly, that she could not understand at first, that she was wrong to choose for herself the form of a slender pin, in order to gratify her insatiable appetite.

(This is a ridicule to Yogis and students, that emaciate themselves with intense study and Yoga, only with a desire to pamper their bodies afterwards, with luxuries and carnal enjoyments).

17. Her object was to have her food, and not the contemptible form of the pin; her heart desired one thing, and she found herself in another form, that was of no use to her purpose.

18. It was her silliness, that led her make the injudicious choice of needleship for herself; and so it is with the short witted, that they lack the sense of judging beforehand, about their future good.

19. An arduous attempt to accomplish the desired object, is often attended by a different result; and even success on one hand, becomes a failure on another; just as the mirror is soiled by the breath, while it shows the face to the looker. (Disappointment lurks in many a shape, and often stings us with success).

20. How be it, the Rákshasí soon learnt to be content with her needleship, after she had relinquished her gigantic form; although she viewed her transformation as worse, than her dissolution itself. (Utter annihilation is more desirable to the Yogi than his metamorphosis to meaner forms).

21. Lo! the contrariety in the desires of the infatuated, who distaste in a trice, what they fondly wished at one time; as this fiend was disgusted at her pinship in lieu of her monstrous figure. (And so they wilfully shun the object of their former fondness, as the suicides and dying people quit their fond bodies without remorse).

22. As one dish of food is easily replaced by another, suiting the taste of the voluptuary; so this fiend did not hesitate to shun her gigantic body, which she took to taste the heart blood of animals in her pinnate form.

23. Even death is delectable to the giddy headed, when they are overfond of some thing else; as the minim of a meagre needle was desirable to the monstrous fiend for the gratification of her fiendish desire.

24. Now this needle took the rarefied form of air, and moved about as the colic wind (colica flatulenta), after all living beings, in quest of her suction of animal gore.

25. Its body was that of fiery heat, and its life the vital breath of animals; its seat was in the sensitive heart, and it was as swift as the particles of solar and lunar beams.

26. It was as destructive as the blade of the deadly sword, and as fleet as the effluvia flying in air. It penetrated into the body in the form of the minutiae of odor.

27. It was ever bent to do evil, like an evil spirit, as she was now known by that name; and her sole object was to kill the lives of others at her pleasure.

28. Her body was afterwards divided into two halves; one of which was as fine as a silken thread, and the other as soft as a thread of cotton.

29. Súchí ranged all about the ten sides of the world, in these two forms of hers; and pierced and penetrated into the hearts of living beings, with all her excruciating pains.

30. It was for the accomplishment of all these purposes of hers, whether they be great or little; that Karkatí forsook her former big body, and took the form of the acute and small needle. (Because humbleness and acuteness are the means of success in every project).

31. To men of little understanding, a slight business becomes an arduous task; as the foolish fiend had recourse to her austerities, in order to do the mean work of the needle.

32. Again men however good and great, can hardly get rid of their natural disposition; and it was for this reason that the great Rákshasí, performed her austere devotion, in order to become a vile pin for molesting mankind.

33. Now as Súchí was roving about in the sky, her aerial form which was big with her heinous ambition, disappeared in air like vapour, or as a thick cloud in autumn.

34. Then entering in the body of some sensualist or weak or too fat a person, this inward colic flatulence of Súchí, assumed the shape of Visúchiká or cholera.

35. Sometimes she enters in the body of some lean person, as also in those of healthy and wise people; and appearing at first as a colic pain, becomes a real cholera at last.

36. She is often delighted, to take her seat in the hearts of the ignorant; but is driven back afterwards by the good acts and prayers, and mantras and medicines of the wise.

37. In this manner she continued many years in her rambles; her bipartite body kept sometimes flying up in the air, and oftentimes creeping low on the ground.

38. She lies concealed in the dust of the ground, and under the fisted fingers of hands; she hides herself in the sun-beams, in air and in the threads of cloths. (All this refers to the pestilential air).

39. She is hid in the intestines, entrails and genitals, and resides in the bodies of pale and ash coloured persons; she abides in the pores, lines and lineaments of the body; as also in dry grass and in the dried beds of rivers (All these are abodes of malaria).

40. She has her seat among the indigent, and in the naked and uncovered bodies of men; as also in those which are subject to hard breathings. She dwells in places infested by flies and of obstructed ventilation, as also in green verdures excepting only of the mango and woodapple (bel) trees.

41. She lurks in places scattered with bones and joints of animal bodies, and such as are disturbed by violent winds, and gusts of air, she lies in dirty places, and in cold and icy grounds and likewise in polluted cloths and places polluted by them.

42. She sits in holes and hollow places, withered trees, and spots infested by crows, flies and peacocks. Also in places of dry, humid and high winds, and in benumbed fingers and toes.

43. As also in cloudy regions, in cavernous districts of the form of rotten bodies; in regions of melting and driving snows, and in marshy grounds abounding in ant hills and hills of málúra trees. (_Málúra_ is _Kapitha_ or _kath-bel_, which is deemed unwholesome).

44. She exhibits herself in the mirage of desert sand, and in wildernesses abounding with ravenous beasts and snakes. Sometimes she is seen in lands infested by venomous reptiles, and disgusting leeches and worms.

45. She frequents the stagnate pools, soiled by dry leaves and those chewed by the Pisáchas; and haunts the hovels beside the cross ways, where passengers halt and take shelter from cold.

46. She rambles in all places, ever where the leeches suck the blood of men, and vile people tear them with their nails and hold them in their fists for feeding upon them. (Here is a relation between the blood sucking Súchí or Needle and the leeches).

47. In this manner she passes in all places, that we view in the landscape of cities in drawings; until she is tired with her long journey through them.

48. She then stops in her course like a tired bullock, whose body is heated by travelling through towns, with loads of cotton and utensils on their backs.

49. She afterwards lays her down to rest in some hidden place, like a needle tired with continued sewing; and there drops down like it, from its bridling thread in the hand of the sewer.

50. The hard needle held in the hand of the sewer, never hurts his finger; because a servant however sharp he may be, is never faithless or is injurious to his master.

51. The iron needle growing old in its business of stitching, was at last lost by itself; like the rotten plank of a boat, bearing the burthensome ballast of stones in it.

52. It wandered about on all sides of its own accord, and was driven to and fro like chaff by the driving winds, according to the course of nature (with all things).

53. Being taken up by some one, it is fed with the fag end of a thread put into its mouth, as the malady of cholera is caught by those human parasites, who glut themselves with food supplied by the sap of another.

54. The malady of colic, like the needle, is ever fond of feeding on the pith of others with its open mouth; and continually finds the thread-like heartstring of some body put into its hole.

55. Thus the strong bodies of greedy and heinous beings, are nourished by the sap of the weak and innocent, as the colic disease preys on the lean bodies of the poor; and the sharp needle is supported by the thin thread of the needy (who cannot afford to buy new suits).

56. Though the heart of Súchí like the hole of the needle, was to receive the thread-like sap of the patient's heart; yet her power to pierce it, was like that of the sewing needle, which is as potent as the piercing sun-beams, to penetrate into the toughest substances.

214769 57. At last Súchí came to find on a sudden, the fault of her wrong
214770 choice of the puny body (of the needle); which was to be filled with her 214771 scanty fare of a bit of thread, and then she began to repent for her 214772 folly.

214773
214774 58. She continued however with all her might, to trudge on in her wonted 214775 course, of pricking and piercing the bodies of others; and 214776 notwithstanding her great regret, she could not avoid the cruelty of her 214777 nature.

214778
214779 59. The sewing man cuts and sews the cloth; agreeably to his own liking; 214780 but the weaver of destiny weaves the long loom of lengthened desires in 214781 all bodies, and hides their reason under the garb of her own making.

214782
214783 60. The colic Súchí went on like the sewing needle, in her business 214784 of piercing the hearts of people by hiding her head; as it is the 214785 practice of robbers to carry on their rogueries, by covering their 214786 faces. (All the three are sly boots, and carry on their trades under the 214787 seal of secrecy).

214788
214789 61. She like the needle with the sewing thread behind it, raises her 214790 head to make and look at the loop-hole, that she should penetrate in the 214791 manner of burglars, making and marking the holes in the wall for their 214792 entry.

214793
214794 62. She entered alike in the bodies of the weak and strong, like the 214795 needle stitching cloths of all textures (whether silken, linen or 214796 fibrous); as it is the custom of the wicked to spare neither the just 214797 nor unjust (from their calumny and villainy).

214798
214799 63. The colic pain like the piercing needle, being pressed under the 214800 fingers, lets off its griping, like the thread of the needle in its act
214801 of sewing. (So the wicked when caught in the act, let out and give up 214802 their wickedness).

214803
214804 64. The acute and unfeeling colic, being as ignorant as the stiff and 214805 heartless needle, of the softness or dryness of the object; pierces the 214806 hardest breast, without deriving any sweetness from it. (So the 214807 unfeeling ruffians molest the moneyless, to no benefit to themselves).

214808
214809 65. The needle is compared with a rich widow, being both equally stern 214810 and full of remorse; both equally veiled and speechless, and with their 214811 eye of the needle, are empty in their joyless hearts.

214812
214813 66. The needle hurts no body (but rather does good in clothing mankind, 214814 by mending their tattered habits); and yet she is dragged by the thread, 214815 which is no other than the thread of her fate (woven by the fatal 214816 sisters for her drudgery).

214817
214818 67. Slipt from the finger of her master, the needle sleeps in peace 214819 after her trudging, in company with her fellows of dirt and dregs; for 214820 who is there that does not deem himself blest, in the company of his 214821 equals, when he is out of employ?

214822
214823 68. The herd of common people, is ever fond of mixing with the ignorant 214824 rabble in their modes of life; because there is no body that can avoid 214825 the company of his equals. (Kind flies with its own kind; or, Birds of 214826 one feather fly together).

214827
214828 69. The lost needle when found by a blacksmith and heated in the hearth,
214829 flies to heaven by the breath of the bellows, after which it disappears 214830 in the air. (So the society of the good elevates one to heaven, which 214831 leads at last to his final liberation).

214832
214833 70. In this manner the current of vital airs, conducts the breath of 214834 life in to the heart; which becomes the living spirit, by force of the 214835 acts of its prior states of existence.

214836
214837 71. The vital airs being vitiated, in the body, cause the colic pains known by different names; such as flatulence, bile and the like.

72. The colic caused by vitiation of the Vyána air, produces many diseases, and affects all the members of the body with a watery fluid. When it comes by breathing of the lungs, it causes the Váya súla or pulmonary colic of lungs, and is attended by disfigurement of the body, and insanity or hysteria known as the hysteric colic.

73. Sometimes it comes from the hands of sheepkeepers, and by the smell of the sheep's wool in blankets; and at others it seizes the fingers of children, and causes them to tear their bed cloths therewith.

74. When it enters the body by the foot, it continues in sucking the blood; and with all its voracity, becomes satisfied with very little food.

75. It lies in the glandular vessel of the faeces, with its mouth placed downward; and takes at pleasure any form, it likes to assume as its prerogative.

76. It is the nature of the malicious, to show the pervertedness of their hearts by doing injury to others; as it is characteristic of the base people to raise a row for their pleasure, and not for any gain or good to themselves.

77. The miserly think much of their gain of even a single cowry: so deeprooted is the avaricious selfishness of human nature. (All little gain is no gain, compared with the wants of men).

78. It was but for a particle of blood, or as much as could be picked out by the point of a pin, that the colic Súchí was bent on the destruction of men: so the wise are fools in their own interests (and so do cut-throats kill others for a single groat).

79. How great is my master-stroke, says the needle, that from stitching the shreds of cloth, have come to the pitch of piercing the hearts of men; so be it and I am happy at my success.

80. As the rust of the lazy needle passes off in sewing, without being rubbed with dust; so must it take the rust, unless it is put in the action of piercing the patient and passive shreds. (The rolling stone gathers no moss).

81. The unseen and airy darts of fate, are as fatal as the acts of the cruel Visúchi; though both of them have their respite at short intervals of their massacres.

82. The needle is at rest after its act of sewing is done; but the wicked are not satisfied, even after their acts of slaughter are over.

83. It dives in the dirt and rises in the air, it flies with the wind and lies down wherever it falls; it sleeps in the dust and hides itself at home and in the inside, and under the cloths and leaves. It dwells in the hand and ear-holes, in lotuses and heaps of woolen stuffs. It is lost in the holes of houses, in clefts of wood and underneath the ground. (Compare the adventures of a pin in Gay's Fables).

84. Válmíki added:—As the sage was speaking in this manner, the sun went down in the west, and the day departed to its evening service. The assembly broke after mutual salutations, to perform their sacred ablution; and joined again on the next morning, with the rising beams of the sun to the royal palace.

CHAPTER LXXI.

REMORSE OF SÚCHÍ.

Argument. Remorse of Karkatí at her transformation to a Needle from her former gigantic form.

Vasishtha continued:—After the carnivorous fiend—Karkatí, had feasted for a long period on the flesh and blood of human kind; she found her insatiable voracity to know no bounds, and never to be satisfied with anything.

2. She used to be satisfied erewhile, with a drop of blood in her form of the needle; and she now became sorry, at the loss of the insatiable thirst and appetite of her former state.

3. She thought in herself, O pity it is! that I came to be a vile needle; with so weak and slender a body, that I can take nothing for my food.

4. How foolish I have been to forego my former gigantic form, and change my dark cloudy figure for something as the dry leaf of a forest tree.

5. O wretch that I am, to have foregone my dainty food of flesh flavoured with fat. (The Ráskshasa cannibals are raw flesh-eaters and feeders on the fat of animals).

6. I am doomed to dive in dirt, and drop down on the ground; to be trodden and trampled over under the feet of people, and soiled and sullied in the filth.

7. O me miserable, helpless and hopeless thing, and without any support or status of mine; from one woe I fall to another, and one danger is succeeded by another unto me!

8. I have no mistress nor maidservant, nor my father nor mother; I have got no son nor brother, nor any one to serve or befriend me.

9. I have no body nor abode, nor any refuge nor asylum anywhere; nor have I a fixed dwelling in any spot, but am driven about, like the fallen leaves of forest trees by the driving winds.

10. I am subject to all accidents, and exposed to every kind of calamity; I wish for my extinction, but it wishes not to approach unto me. (Death flies from the destitute).

11. What else have I done to have given away my own big body, in the foolishness of my heart; than parted like a madman, with a precious jewel for a paltry piece of glass.

12. One calamity is enough to turn the brain out of order; but what will be my case when it is followed by other calamities in endless succession.

13. I am hung up (with the cloth) to be suffocated by the smoke, and dropped down in the streets to be trodden under foot; I am cast away with the dirt, and hid under the grass to my great distress.

14. I serve at another's will, and am guided by my guide; I am stark naked while I sew for others, and am ever a dependant on another's guidance.

15. Long do I drudge and trudge for a paltry gain, and stitching alone is all the work that I have to perform for life. O unlucky that I am, that my ill luck even is so very luckless.

16. I see the demon of despair rising before me, upon my penitence of this day; and threatening to make an end of this body, of which I have made an offering to him.

17. What better fate can await on me, after my loss of so big and bulky a body by my foolishness; than to be annihilated into nothing, rather than be a thing which is good for nothing.
18. What man will pick me up, who am as lean as a mollusk (or thread worm); from the heap of ashes, under which I lie buried by the wayside.
19. No keensighted man will take into his consideration a wretched and a forlorn being; as nobody living on a high hill, ever stoops to take notice of the grass growing on the ground below.
20. I cannot expect to raise myself higher, while I am lying in the sea of ignorance; what blind man can perceive the glorious sun-light, who is guided by the flash of fireflies?
21. I know not therefore how long I shall have to labour under my difficulties, when I find myself already drowned in a sea of misery.
22. When shall I be restored again to the form of the daughter of Anjanágiri mountain; and will stand as a pillar over the ruins of the nether and upper worlds?
23. When shall I have my arms reaching to the clouds, and my eyes flashing as lightning; my garb becoming as white as snow, and my hairs touching the sky.
24. My big belly resembling a huge cloud, and my long breasts hanging below as pillows; shaking with the motion of my body, in its dancing like the pinions of a peacock.
25. The ash-white light emitted by my laughter, cast the light of the sun into the shade; and my former high stature, threatened to devour the terrible god of death.
26. My hollow sockets deep as the holes of mortars, flashed erewhile with living fire; like the rays of the sun; and my large legs moved as two monumental pillars in my rambling.
27. When shall I have my big belly, with its large cavity like a pot-belly; and when shall I have again my soft black nails, resembling the dark and humid clouds of autumn.
28. When will those tender smiles return to me, whereby I moved the great Rákshasas to my favour; and when shall I dance in my giddy circles, at the music of the tabor amidst the forests.
29. When will that big belly of mine, be filled with potfuls of fattened liquor; and be fed with heaps of the flesh and bones of dead bodies.
30. When shall I get me drunk, with drinking the blood of human gores; and become merry and giddy, until I fall fast asleep.
31. It was I who destroyed my former brilliant body, by my bad choice of austerities, and accepted this petty needlish form, like one taking the sulphate of gold, instead of that precious metal.
32. Ah! where is that huge body which filled all sides, and shone as the sable hill of Anjanágiri; and what is this puny and pinny form of the shape of a spider's leg, and as thin and lean as a tender blade of grass.
33. The ignorant are found to throw away a golden jewel, as useless on the ground as a piece of glass; and so have I cast aside my shining body, for a bit of this blackest needle.
34. O great Vindhya with thy hollow and snow covered caves! why dost thou not destroy thy dull elephants by thy native lions? It is I that am as silly as an elephant—_gaja mūrkhā_.

- 215045 35. O my arms! which used to break down mountain peaks, why do ye fail 215046 to pluck the butter-like moon with thy moony nails?
215047
- 215048 36. O my breast! which was as fair as the side of the snowy mountain, 215049 even without my glassy ornaments; why dost thou not show thy hairs,
215050 which were as large as leeches that feed on lion's flesh?
215051
- 215052 37. O my eyes! that used to dispel the darkness of the darkest night, 215053 and kindle the dry fuel with your glaring fire; why do ye cease to 215054 lighten the air with your effulgence?
215055
- 215056 38. O my shoulder blades! are ye broken down and levelled with the 215057 earth? or are ye crushed and smashed or mouldered and worn out by age?
215058
- 215059 39. O my moonbright face! why dost thou not shine over me with thy 215060 bright beams; resembling the everlasting light of the orb of the moon, 215061 now at an end for ever?
215062
- 215063 40. O my hands! where is your strength fled today? See ye not, how I am 215064 transformed to an ignoble needle, that is moved about by the touch of 215065 the foot of a fly?
215066
- 215067 41. Alas! the cavity of my navel, which was as deep as a well, and beset 215068 by hairs resembling rows of beautiful plants about it; and my 215069 protuberant posteriors, which likened to the bottom of the Vindhya 215070 hills.
215071
- 215072 42. Where is that towering stature reaching to the sky, and what is this 215073 new earned contemptible form of the needle; where is that mouth, hollow 215074 as the vault of the sky, and what is this hole of the needle? Where is 215075 that heap of my flesh meat, and what is this drop of watery food? Ah!
215076 how lean have I grown, but who is to be blamed for an act of my own 215077 doing?
215078

215082 CHAPTER LXXII.

215083 FERVOUR OF SÚCHÍ'S DEVOTION.

215084
215085
215086
215087 Argument. Ardour of Súčhí's austerities and Indra's Inquiry of it.
215088
215089

215090 Vasishtha continued:—Afterwards Súčhí became silent and motionless, and 215091 thought of resuming her austerities for the sake of regaining her long 215092 lost body.
215093

215094 2. With this intention she returned to the Himálayas; and there
215095 abstaining from her desire of human gore, she sat reiterating her 215096 castigations.
215097

215098 3. She saw in her mind her form of the needle, entering into her heart 215099 with her breathings.
215100

215101 4. Thus meditating on her mental form of the needle, she was wafted by 215102 her vital breath to the top of the hill, and alighted on it like a 215103 vulture from high.
215104

215105 5. There she remained alone and apart from all living beings, and sat
215106 amidst burning fires, with her form of an ash-coloured stone (_i.e._ 215107 besmeared by ashes like a _yogi_).
215108

215109 6. She sat there as a sprout of grass, springing in that dry and 215110 grassless spot; but soon faded away, to a blade of withered hay in the 215111 sandy desert.
215112

215113 7. She remained standing on tip-toe of her only one foot, and continued in the castigation of her own self. (Standing of the one legged needle, represented the posture of devotees standing on one leg).

8. She lightly touched the ground with her tiptoe stature, and avoiding all sidelong looks, gazed on the upper sky with her upraised face and uplifted eyes.

9. The acute point of the black iron needle, firmly preserved its standing posture by penetrating the ground; while it fed itself upon the air, which it inhaled by its uplifted mouth.

10. The scarcity of food in the forest, made it look up as in quest of some prey coming from a distance; while its lower part shaking with the wind, enticed the unwary to approach towards it.

11. The ray of light issuing as a pencil from the needle hole, became like its attendant guard on the hinder part.

12. As men are kindly disposed towards the mean, that are favourites to them; so was the needle attached to the pencil of ray, that became its constant attendant.

13. The needle had another constant companion, of its devotion in its own shadow; but the blackness of its person, made it always to remain behind the back. (The shadow of a thing ever remains behind it).

14. Thus the shadowy needle and pencil of ray, having firmly adhered themselves to the iron needle; these three have always become intimate friends, like all good people mutually assisting one another.

15. The trees and plants of the mountain forest, felt compassion for Súchí on seeing her in this plight; for who is there, that bears no sympathy for the pious devotee, or her penances and austerities?

16. The needle that was thus stuck fast to the ground by its foot, and had sprung up like some faculty of the mind; was fed with the fragrance of the fruitage, blown and borne by the breeze to its uplifted mouth.

17. The woodland gods and demigods, continued to fill its mouth with the dust; of blown and unblown flowers in the woods.

18. But it did not swallow the powdered dust of meat; which the god Indra had caused to be thrown into its mouth, for the purpose of frustrating the efficacy of its devotion.

19. Its fixity of purpose, did not permit it to swallow the delicious powder; because a person however mean he may be, is sure of success by his firmness of mind.

20. The god of winds, with his power of uprooting the mountains; was astonished to find the needle, averse to swallow the food, ministered to it in the form of the pollen of <flowers>.

21. The resolute devotee is never to be shaken from his purpose, though he is plunged in the mud or drowned in water, or scattered by the winds and thrown into the burning fire.

22. Or when he is shattered by showers of hailstones, or struck by the lightning or battered by rain drops, and intimidated by thunder claps.

23. The resolute mind is not changed in a thousand years, and the feet of the firm, like those of the drowsy and dead drunk, never move from their place.

24. The holy hermit who is devoted to his purpose, loses in time the motion of his external organs; but obtains by the exercise of his reason, the light of true knowledge in his soul.

25. Thus did Súchí gain the light of knowledge, and become a seer of the 215183 past and future. She became cleansed of the dross of her sins, and her 215184 Visúchí or impurity was turned to Súchí or purity.

215185
215186 26. She came to know the truly knowable, in her own understanding; and 215187 she felt true bliss in her soul, after the removal of her sins by 215188 devotion.
215189
215190 27. She continued for many thousand years in her austere devotion, to 215191 the great astonishment of seven times seven worlds, that got affrighted 215192 at her austerities. (The cause of their fright was, lest she should take 215193 possession of their happy states, by the merit of her devotion).
215194
215195 28. The great mountain was set in a blaze, by the fervour of her 215196 devotion; and that flame spread to all the worlds, like the blaze of a 215197 portentous meteor.
215198
215199 29. This made Indra the god of heaven, to ask Nárada respecting the 215200 cause of this intense devotion; saying "Who is it that engrosses to her 215201 the fruition of worlds, by her austere devotion"? To whom Nárada thus 215202 replied:
215203
215204 30. "It is Súchí, who by her continued devotion of thousands of years,
215205 has attained her highest state of enlightenment; and it is that light
215206 that now enflames all the worlds."
215207
215208 31. It is Súchí's devotion, O lord of gods, that makes the Nágás to sigh 215209 and the hills to tremble. It causes the celestials to fall down, and the 215210 sea to overflow on earth. It dries up all things, and casts to shade the 215211 bright orb of the sun itself.
215212
215213
215214
215215

215216 CHAPTER LXXIII.

215217 NÁRADA'S RELATION OF SÚCHÍ'S DEVOTION.

215218
215219
215220
215221 Argument. Description of Súchí's _austerities_, and Indra's Inquiry
215222 about them.
215223
215224

215225 Vasishtha related:—Indra having learnt about the austere devotion of 215226 Karkatí, had the curiosity to know more of her through Nárada, whom he 215227 asked about the matter.
215228

215229 2. Indra said:—I know Súchí to have acquired her fiendish practice (of 215230 blood sucking), by means of her devotion; but who is this apish Karkatí 215231 that is so greedy of her gain (of flesh and bones).
215232

215233 3. Nárada replied:—It is Karkatí the malevolent fiend, that became _Jíva
215234 Súchí_ or colic pain of the living, and assumed the shape of an iron 215235 needle as its support or fulcrum.
215236

215237 4. Having afterwards forsaken that prop, it entered into the human body 215238 as its landing place; and then it flew up to the heart on the vehicle of 215239 vital breath, and is seated in the car of the current air in atmosphere.
215240 (The resting place _locus standi_, point d'appui or powsto_ of the 215241 diseases of life).
215242

215243 5. This colic of life—_Jíva Súchí_, having entered into the bodies of 215244 vicious lives, passes through the canals of their entrails and the pores 215245 of their flesh, fat and blood, and then nestles as a bird in the 215246 interior part.
215247

215248 6. It enters the intestines with the breath of the air, and there 215249 settles in the form of flatulent colic; afterwards being seated at 215250 the end of the _nyagrodha_ artery, it forms the plethoric colic with 215251 fulness of blood and inflammation.

- 215252
215253 7. It also enters the body through other parts and organs, and receives 215254 different names according to its situation; and then feeds itself upon 215255 their flesh and marrow (as the best food for living beings).
215256
- 215257 8. Fastened to the knots of wreathed flowers and stuck to the leafy 215258 garlands, decorating the breasts and cheeks of fond damsels, she steep 215259 enraptured with them, on the bosoms of their loving spouses. (_i.e._ The 215260 menial needle is blessed in the company of her mistress).
215261
- 215262 9. She flies to the bodies of birds in wood-land retreats, which are 215263 free from worldly sorrow and strife; and flutters on the tops of flowers
215264 of the Kalpa arbours of Paradise, or rolls on beds of lotuses in the 215265 lakes.
215266
- 215267 10. She flies over the high hills of the gods, in the forms of
